DEATH.

BY DAVID L. RICHARDSON. We weep and tremble at the doom, The dreadful doom of death, 'Tis sad, amidst the fair earth's bloom, To yield this mortal breath. The brave may sternly bear the pain, That soon must bass away: But O! to think that ne'er again Dear friends with eager hands, shall greet, Or fond hearts share love's converse sweet, Perwholms as with dismay-

'Tis troo that trusting faith is told Of worlds beyond the sky, And few there are so blind or bold As dare such creed deny. It is not that an after state Or dark or doubtful seems: Alas! we shrink from future fate, Because we may not brook the thought That hours, with life's enchantments fraught, Are unreturning dreams.

AII. We find each mortal bliss alloyed, Each smile foretells a tear, But still, the breast would soon be cloved That never felt a fear, The beauty of the brighest beam Is deepened by the shade: Pairest the stars in darkness gleum-The broad, red sun at eventie Assumes a most imposing pride Infloating clouds arrayed.

١٣. Perfection hath not reigned on earth, Nor ruled the human mind; We pant not for diviner worth, Nor raptures more refined, A moral weakness makes us cling To moral forms alone; We feel we cannot coldly fling On Letho's dark insatiate stream The charms of life's familiar dream. And turn to scenes unknown.

'Tis this that fills the final hour With mournfulness and dread; Love's tender tics and friendship's power Avail not with the dead. But, though we meet to part no more, We may not meet the same; The things that linked our hearts of yore "Are chains that death's cold hand divides, For naught in holier reals abides Of this terestrial frame. Thy radient fields, Eternity! The dreamer's breast alarra; They echo not a human sigh, Nor own a human charm Thy skies the dazzled soul appal And too severely glow;
