How almost next to impossible it is for one of the "sising generation," out in this "Far West," to conpopulous and refined communities, was, not forty years a mere desert. Even the tew who are left amongst us and came here in the early day—who have seen the progress of the country, stride by stride—must have a difficulty in 'realizing it. The recollections of the progress of the country, stride by stride—must have a difficulty in 'realizing it. The recollections of the seemes of their youth must appear to them more like debisions and dreams, than cool reminiscences of actual reality. How hard to believe, for example, that no least appeared in a New Orleans paper of that date:

But no doubt the horse boat started, and no doubt that it was thought to be at the time a most improved mode of locomotion—something that beat the keel-boats "all to sticks." And we shall begin to realize that such may-and may must have been the fact, when we turn our eyes to another statement, which excites a mixed feeling of incredulity and wonder—ever though we know the statement is true.
