THE PRAIRIE GRAVE.

BY THE LATE M C FIELD, ESQ. He will slumber as well and as soundly there As a prince in a banner'd aisle, And his dust will as many true tear drops share

As the gorgeous marble pile! No words to be read are over his head, And an soulptur'd prise to save The fame of the pilgrim, pale and dead,

In his lonely prairie grave! But the whispering breezes wander there, And they speak of the sky above him. Of the stars that are there, all bright and fair, Like spirits that watch and love him. And a bright stream flows near his lone report

While each lowly murmuring wave, Secure to heave a sigh as it hurries by The grass-grown prairie grave. -O, the one who sleeps in that lonely spot, Left foodness and love behind him And there's one yet weeps who has not forgot In her heart of hearts to find him!

Ah! that lonely mound in the prairie wild. Comes oft to a mother's musing. When she bends and prays for the absentchild She has sighed for ever since losing. "Twas a summer morn in the solitude,

Ere the sun o'er the prairie rose, That we dress'd the dead for his lowly bed And bore him to his repose, O, the silence then of the broad, broad sky, And the wide spread green below, Seem'd to hush e'en the waters rolling by

Into strange and solemn wo Not a willow twig, not a stone was there To be left on the simple mound, But the grass is green, and the flow'rs are fair

That are sprinkl'd there around. No words to be read, are over his head, And no sculptur'd praise to save The fame of the pilgrim, pale and dead, In his lonely prairie grave.

The following, from one of the old Bittish Third street, opposite the Post Office, Pitts-, is exquisite. It is the very essence of faney .-"It is addressed to a lady, upon whose bosom a flake of burgh. now fell and melted : The envious anow comes down in haste To prove thy breast less fair, bought and sold. But grieves to see itself surpassed, FRODUCE DEFARTMENT. Flour; Clover Seed; Bulk Pork; Roll Butter; Bacon d melts into a tear.
