From Fraziar's Magazine. THE OLD YEAR'S TRACK.

It hath sought that shadowy shore To the dreamer's memory known. To the place of the years that come no more Hath the reinless pilgrim flown. And where shall a mortal searcher meet The track of those swift and soundless feet?

In woods where another spring Its wealth of leaves hath piled O'er the silent city's mouldering In the far-forgotten wild. It hath cast a shadow of deeper gloom O'er buried temple and ruined tomb. On the hills of ancient snow, Where another winter's might Hath raised the rainbow towers that glow On the lonely glacier's height; Our hearths grow cold, and our temples hoar, But they grow in their glory ever more. In the deep where rocky isles Have risen above the foam. It hath woke the first faint green that smiles

By some future monarch's home; But the lark sent forth hope and prayer Lie low in the coral caverns there. In the city where the tide Of life rolls strong and deep, No trace by time's passing footsteps made Will those troubled waters keep ;

For wealth and, waste, and want sweep on As they swept through the years of ages gone. But, oh ! in many a heart

Of that deep, unsounded wave, It hath left a trace that will ne'er depart; Through the streams of far time lave The ruins, and with blossoms fill Their wastes, they will be but ruined still.

Perchance of forsaken love. Perchance of forgotten truth: •Or, it may be, an unforgotten grave, Where they laid the locks of youth. With hopes that have died when bright and high, Or memories dark that can never die

And thus have the years of earth In their silence sped away, Yet the world unwearied still looks forth For the light of a better day! And, oh! that each swiftly closing year Might bring the dawn of that day more near.
