The American of yesterday has another attack upon Road question. The conduct of the American in this and Journal of this week, written by one of the editors matter has caused more vexation to the friends of the of that paper, dated road than any other occurrence that has grown out of that Ges. Moorhead had resolved to throw no obstacles in the way of the passage of the bill; he believed dedly anti-slavery in feeling and doctrine, the wild and imdely anti-slavery in feeling and doctrine, the preach it was desired by a large portion of our citizens, and although his own interests, and those of his associates, might suffer from the construction of a RailRoad be, tween this elty and Cumberland, yet he was willing to run the risk of this pecuniary injury, rather than incur the imputation of opposing the project from incur the imputation of opposing the project from sordid motives. This was well known to many of the friends of the road, and we believe, to none better than to some of those who have an influence in shaping the course of the American.
