Nothing is said as to the number of prisoners they have made. It appears, however, from their own account, that they have lost not less than 1000 men, killed and wounded, in different skirmlshes, between this baggage has fallen into the hands of he enemy. This, consisting of tents, stores, &c, is of much more importance in India than in Europe and America, and consequently a most severe loss on the present occursion. He is not disposed to doubt British bravery, but he expresses his doubts as to the official reports that reach us of the progress of British nums in the Panjaub. Even by their own lost accounts, it would appear that they were the attacked rather than the negressive party, and that the whole achievement consists of in driving a portion of the Sikh army-across the river. This they have done on previous occasions, without much effect. The other side of the Sutlej is the Sikh side of the river; if, therefore, they were driven back to it, they must have been (after three victorious battles on the part of the British) on the other, the Baglish side of the river, and the Sikhs, so far from that having their territory invaded, are the actual invaders on the British side.
