Mary S. Murray vs. Wm. A. Greatrake. The defendant is charged with the seduction of the plaintiff, under a promise of marriage.

Mr. Swartzwelder, for prosecution, said his feelings were not those of paid counsel, but what he would say would be the solemn convictions of his heart. Silence was ofttimes more elequent than speech. It must be borne in mind that the story of the defendant rests upon the statement of the prosecutrix. There were eight letters writte. Where were those that had not been offered? They had been suddenly concealed, and if under the rules of court, and the provisions of the law, he could be permitted to state the facts as they really were, the rehearsal would call down upon the leprous villain, her seducer, the withering scorn the leprous villain, her seducer, the withering scorn is a long to the part is fact to your satisfaction. If this fact is established, the prosecution fails. If it is not established.
