RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

We publish this morning a communication relation to this enterprise, in which the writer seems to have been favored with some special revelations in regard to "the facts and history of that stream," not heretofore dreamed of in common philosophy. Practical men, engineers and others, consider it quite possible to make the Ohio river a far more valuable channel of over, the "skrickes" die away on the air, and to its full capacity, a navigable stage of water will be wanted all the year round. They believe, too, that if it can be done it will be of more value to commerce that half a dozen railroads of the same length. What the particular mode or rested almost every day in Pittsburgh, and taken to say. We sre wedded to no theories or likely some of them are freesoilers too. But no are in for that.

Any argument against the undertaking easily answered by a reference to the Monongahela Improvement. In high stages of water that river was navigable for steamers, without dams, and free from tolls. But such stages of water were too few and far between to answer the wants of the rich farming and mineral regions through which it runs. The State authorized its improvement by locks and dams, and the whole country along its banks is doubled in value; and the people up in Greene and Fayette counties, instead of being afraid of dams and tolls, are clamoring for more dams and more tolls, and more of the benefits of constant navigation. When the west contains forty or fifty millions of people, a short fall and spring trade will by no means answer their demands; nor will the railroad ever diminish the value of the river as a channel of commerce. And when the regions along all the sources and tributaries of the Ohio are stripped of their forests and brought under cultivation, the low water seasons of that river will be longer and more seriously felt What, then, shall be done" Shall we stick to the "old fushion" for fear of tolls? The very purpose of getting government aid as much as possible, and aid from the states most directly interested, is to make the improve ment at as little cost to individual contributor as possible, and then the tolls can be fixed at a But perhaps it would increase the time of a trip to Cincinnati a few hours. And what then ! With railroads running parallel with the river all freights that are wanted quick, and all travelers in a hurry will take the railroad; while all heavy freights will take the river; and all trav elers not in great haste will take their choice. But nity-ure dams alarm our correspondent So many will not be needed. But suppose they would. A nation that has already built eighteen build forty or fifty locks and dams. The Pitts-

But the dams would than they do now on the Monongahela river. The tolls would not come out of the coal men, the merchants; but out of the ultimate consuwould increase the cost to the consumer a little, lower prices in the long run than he now pays. At any rate, even with the tolls, he could be furthe magnitude of the enterprise and the imm nished with them at lower prices by the river
