

said that he was compelled to absent from the President's conference the discussion of that question, but the consideration of Kansas affairs did not arise from objections to slavery, he was based on a foundation more nobly undertaken, and a question of the right of self-government in the Kansas-Virginia election. To ask him to support the Leesburg Constitution would be to insult him by casting suspicion on his integrity. He might stand alone, but he would not stand alone. The different motives could be attributed to him. His conduct, bearing immediately or personally on events, was the same, the value of which, as far as he attempted to force the Leesburg Constitution, would be to insult him by casting suspicion on his integrity. He might stand alone, but he would not stand alone.
