NUMBER 102. THE ROBBER OF THE WABASH

A THRILLING ADVENTURE,

CONC. UDED. Thus he opened his affairs to me, and I was fool enough to be equally frank, I admitted that I had some money, and told him my business, and by a most unpresuming course of remark, he drew from me the fact that I had money enough to purchase forty full lots. Finally the conversation lagged, and I began to give my companion a closer scrutiny. I sat in the stern of the canoe, and he was about midships, and facing me. His hair was of a light, flaxen hue, and hung in long curls about his neck; his eatures were regular and handsome; and his complexion very light .--But the color of his face was not what one could call fair. It was a cold, bloodless color, like pale marble. And for the first time, too, I now looked particularly at his eyes. They and glittering like a snake's. When I thought of his age I set him down for not much over thirty.

Suddenly a sharp, cold shudder ran through my frame, and my heart leaped with a wild thrill. As sure as fate—Itknew it—there could be no doubt—I hadtaken into my canoe, and into my confidence. good for me, for every hour is valuable. I world." "Oh, you'll meet him never fear," said my companion Ah! he spoke that with a meaning. I un-, derstood it well. I knew what that sly tone, and that strange gleaming of the eye meant. He meant that he would put me on the road to meet poor Kemp in the other world! I wonder only now that I had not detected the robber when I first saw him, for the expression of his face was so heartless, so icy—and then his eyes had such a wicked look-that the most unpracticed physiognomist could not have tailed to detect the villain at once.

During the rest of the afternoon we conversed, some, but not so freely as before. I could see that the villain's eyes were not so frankly bent upon mine as he spoke, and then he seemed inclined to avoid my direct glances. These movements on his part were not studied, or even intentional; but they were instinctive, as though his very nature led him thus. At length night came on. We ate our supper, and then smoked our pipes, and finally my companion proposed that I should sleep before he did. At first I thought of objecting, but a few minutes reflection told me that I had better as though he were an honest man; so I agreed to his proposition. He took my seat at the stern, and I moved further forward and having removed the thwart upon which my companion had been sitting, I spread my cloak in the bottom of the canoe, and then having placed my value for a pillow, I lay down.— As soon as possible I drew out one of my pistols, and under the cover of a cough, I cocked it. Then I moved my body so that my right arm would be at liberty, and grasping my weapon firmly, with my finger on the guard, I drew up my mintle, slouched my hat, and then settled down for my watch. Fortunately for me the moon was up, and though the forest threw a shadow upon me, yet the beams fell upon Karl, and I could see his every movement. We were well into the Wabash, having entered it about three o'clock "You will call me at midnight," I said drowsily. "Yes." he returned. "Good night." "Good night-and pleasant dreams, I'll have you further on your way than you think ere you wake up again."

"Perhaps so," thought I to myself, as I lowered my head, and pretended to lower myself to sleap.

For half an hour my companion steered the canoe very well, and seemed to take but little notice of me, but at the end of that time I could see that he, became more uneasy. I commenced to score with a long, regularly, drawn breath, and on the instant the villain started as starts the hunter when he hears the tread of game in the woods. But hark! Aha-there was before one lingering fear in my mind that I might shoot the wrong man; but it was gone now. As-the fellow stopped the motion of the paddle, distinctly heard him mutter: "O-ho, my dear sheep-you little dreamed hat Gus Karl was your companion. But he'll do you a good turn. If your friend is dead, you shall follow him, and take your traps to pay your passage to heaven!"

I think these were the very words.

-At any rate, they were their drift. As he thus spoke he noiselessly drew in the paddle. and rose to his feet. I saw him reach up over his left shoulder, and when he brought back his hand he had a huge bowie knife in it. I could see the blade gleam in the pale moon-light, and I saw Karl run his thumb along the edge, and then feel the point! My heart beat carfully, and my breathing was hard. It was with the utmost exertions that I could continue my snoring, but I managed to do it without interruption. Slowly and noiselessly he foul wretch proceeded to approach me. Oh! his step would not have awakened a hound—and his long, gleaming knife was half raised. I could hear the grating of his teeth as he nerved himself for the stroke. The villain was by my side, and measured the distance from his hand to my heart with bis eye. In his left hand he held a thick handkerchief all wadded up. That was to stop my mouth with. Every nerve in my body was now struck, and my heart still as Wanted at 65 Fifth street.
