THE DAILY POST. loudly knocked at the door, and implored me to open, for God's safe, if I was alive.

A SONG FOR THE SEASON. Jack Frost he lived in a fine new house,
White, and light, and tall;
And what was the name of Jack's new house?
Oh, he called it Icicle Hall.

Did Jack live all alone in his house? Oh no! for you must know He had his nº at little wife with him there, And her name was Jenny Snow. You may think they lived upon coolish terms
In their Icicle Hall;

But Frost and Snow were sure to agree, They never fell out at all. They gave their parties and saw their friends, With frequent feast and treat; There was young Mr. Rain and smart Miss Hail, And rattling old Mrs. Sleet.

Sometimes when dull Mr. Fog dropped in, They were not so gay as before; He would hang about the live-long day, And was voted a dismal bore. One day, Jack Frost and his wife resolved To be grand in Icicle Hall; For it would have been strange if Jenny Sno Could not get up a bat'.

The party was large, and gay, and fine, And chandeliers of light With frosted crystals sparkled and shone In rainbow colors bright.

Wreaths all white, and festoons of snow,

But while they walked and danced about, The walls began to etream; The floor was flooded, the roof fell in, Dissolving like a dream. Who had performed this marvellous feat? It was one whom no one saw;
A ided above by the envious Sun,
it was mischievous old Mother Thaw!

AN UNCOMFORTABLE NIGHT.

[CONCLUDED.] Then the curtains waved, parted; a bright beam of moonlight fell on the floor, and, directly intercepting its rays, stood a frightful figure the Satyr of heathen mythology, the origin of our Christian superstitious portraiture of the our Christian superstitious portraiture of the arch-enemy, a huge living specimen of that to our consternation we found open. You may strongest and fiercest of the ape tribe, the strongest and fiercest of the ape tribe, the fancy to what a pitch my fears increased, when Simia Satyrus, or wild man of the woods. This, then, explains the mystery. The creature must have escaped from some menagerie, and found its way in by the open window, and, with the cunning of its race, had concealed itself till the growing darkness gave it increased boldness. I knew enough of the animal's wicked and malignant nature to feel convinced that my only chance of safety lay in eluding its observation; while, therefore, it stood at the further end of the room, still grasping the curtain, and surveywith a horribly grotesque hefore my face; but my slight movement at once arrested the creature's suspicious glance, and, with a single bound, it squatted itself, grinning and guashing its teeth, on the foot of my bed. I now gave myself up for lost, and endeavored to prepare for a horrible death by summoning to my aid all the support of religion. While I strove to fix my thoughts on the sujects which should occupy the mind of man in his last extremity, I fixed my eyes with the fascination of terror on my fearful companion; and to my inexpressible relief and thankfulness, I found that he grew restless and uneasy under my steady gaze, and turned his head in another direction. All at once flashed into my mind the stories I had read, and only half believed, of the power of the human eye over the brute creation, and I redoubled the intensity of my stare, looking fixedly into the creature's eyes. It grinned and jabbered, and moved its arms about restlessly; and, mindful of my only remaining chance, in fore it could seize me in a gripe which, I well knew, would not relax till it left me a mangled Gradually, however, the creature drooped its hideous head on its breast, and was on the point of faling asleep, when a brand from the nearly extinct fire fell with a slight noise, and aroused it again to full activity. The flame which suddealy leaped up, for a moment diverted the attention of my jailor; and the uncouth creature rose from its squatting position on my bed, and approached the fire, holding out its mis-shapen ands, and covering over the warmth with a hor rible resemblance to human action.

I now resolved to slip, if possible, unseen from presence. When I attempted to move, however, I found my right foot, which had been under the reature as it sat on the bed, so completely is now receiving in store the following, which he will sell numbed or twisted as to be altogether useless. numbed or twisted as to be altogether useless; and the attempt to move only served to draw or me the wrathful notice of my enemy, Uttering a kind of hissing sound between its teeth, it darted to the further corner of the room, and se zing a large bone from the heap that lay there, again took up its quarters on the bed, and threatened to strike me with the bone in a manner evilently copied from that to which it was accused in the form that to which it was accused in the form that to which it was accused in the form that to which it was accused in the form that to which it was accused in the form that to which it was accused in the form that to which it was accused in the form that the form the form the form that the form that the form the form the form the f

I fixed my gaze upon it till I began to feel a strange effect produced upon myself; first the grotesque mask seemed to approach nearer and nearer, till it appeared as if it were about to touch me; and then, while everything grew dark around it, it then, while everything grew dark around it, it then the seemed to ships with a role chastly light as if seemed to shine with a pale ghastly light, as if seen far off, at the end of an immeasurable cave. If felt all the sensations which I have heard described by persons who have been mesmerised, and I have no doubt that my nerves, highly wrought upon and excited as they were by the circumstances in which I was placed, were pecucircumstances in which I was placed, were pecucircumstances in which I was placed, were peculiarly sensitive to the subtle influence. As the thought crossed my mind, together with the dread of becoming insensible, and thus being completely at the creature's mercy, I made an oct? completely at the creature's mercy, I made an involuntary movement, as if to free myself from the spell.

The fierce brute aimed a sudden and violent blow at me with the bone which it still held in its grasp. Mechanically, I moved my head to clude the stroke, the full force of which was thus spent on the pillow, or I should probably then and there have ended my earthly career. As it was, the bone glanced off the corner of my temple. I felt an acute pain, a gush of warm blood down my cheek and throat, and for a few moments I became insensible. The instinct of self-preservation restored me to life. I seemed almost by force to recall my scattered senses; and the room being now perfeetly dark, I succeeded by slow degrees in gliding from the bed to the floor, while my tormentor, apparently satisfied with the revenge it had taken, curled itself up in the very place I had just quitted, and slept—at least so I conjectured from the cessation of its restless movements, and now

Every time this occurred, I expected my enemy to wake; but the long, dark, we are the long of wrapped in slumber.
At length with joy and thankfulness which I will not attempt to describe, I perceived a faint light, like a gray mist, steal over the black darkber, and I remember that the sun did not rise

The creature started up at the sound, mode one furious rush at the opening of the curtain, which now let in streak of decided daylight, and at the same moment the crash of broken glass and a succession of wild, piercing cries announced that it had missed its leap, and fallen into the hands of its captors. I confess that at the mo-ment of release from the horrible fate which had been impending over me for so many hours, I felt my strength of mind and body at once give way.

When I revived, I found myself stretched on the bed, the chill morning air blowing in from the open doorway—the door having been wrenched from its hinges—and poor Blackburn, with a face of the deepest anxiety, bending over me with some powerful stimulant. "Oh, thank God, thank God!" he exclaimed, as I endeavored to rise and speak to him. "Keep quiet, my dear fellow; do not move or speak; only look at me if you are in your senses." In a few minutes, I could not only look, but speak, and assure him that I was practically but little the worse for the unpleasant night I had passed; but he would scarcely listen to me, and kept on repeating : 'The satyrus! the wild man of the woods! the most fierce and relentless of animals!-how can you have escaped with life?"

"I thank God that it is so," I replied earnestly; "for truly it has been only the hand of His protection that has guarded me. But where did the creature come from, and how did you discover that it had paid me a visit?" "Oh, that is the worst of all," said poor Blackburn. "It was through my abominable carelessness that the accident occurred; and f anything had befallen you, I never could have forgiven myself. It is bad enough as it "But has the beast escaped from a managerie, or how did it come here?' "It is mine," said Blackburn, ruefully. "The captain of a merchant ship, knowing my turn for natural history, and that I have a small collection in the garden here, gave me the brute a few days ago. I had him chained in an empty stable; and last night, after showing him to A——and G——, I must have missed the lock of the door, and turned the key without shutting it. The man who feeds and attends my animals came as usual about six o'clock this morning, and finding the stable-empty, at once gave the alarm. We traced his footsteps across the mould on knocking at the door the fierce brute flew out of the window, and, catching its foot on the iron staunchion, fell to the ground. It was overpowered, not without some ugly bites and scratches, and we then forced open the door, fully prepared to find your mangled body. Nothing was to be seen but the empty bed and a large stain of blood on the pillow; but we soon found you, insensible, and, as I first thought, dead; though a little examination sufficed to show that you had received no mortal wound. I sannot express my thankfulness. But your es cape is a perfect marvel to me, and as soon as you are rested and refreshed, you must give me an account of what happened." Before long I was seated at a cheerful breakfast-table, making up as best I could for the wear and tear of my constitution during the last few hours. By the time I reached Glasgow, there remained little outward trace of my night's adventure, except a very disreputable black eye, which, for my character's sake, I was forced to cover with a patch; but I will own that many nights clapsed before my sleep ceased to be dis-turbed with frightful visions, or I could get rid of the sight of a grinning, fiendish face, which always started out of the darkness when I closed my eyes. Indeed, to this day, I do not think I ever hear mention made of Liverpool without remembering the very uncomfortable night I passed in my first and last visit there, more than Poor Living .- A good Methodist minister at the West, who lived on a very small salary, was greatly troubled at one time to get his quarterly instalment. He had called on his steward number of times, but had each time been put off with some excuse. His wants at length becoming urgent, he went to his steward and told him that he must have his money, as his family were suffering for the necessaries of life. "Money!" replied the steward. "You preach for money! I thought you preached for the good of souls!" "Souls!" replied the minister; "I can't eat souls, and if I could, it would take a thousand such as yours to make a decent meal."
