THE DAILY POST

FRIDAY MORNING MARCH 5, 1858. A WONDER OF THE WORLD-THE STEAMSHIP LEVIATHAN. Most persons have probably been at a loss to imagine the motives which could have induced any one to embark in so costly an enterprise as the building of a steam vessel of dimensions so disproportionate to those of any yet affoat, as this ship. The undertaking has been naturally attributed to the mere ambition of accomplishing an enterprise in nautical architecture, which shall not be outdone. From the hazards which so large a ship must run, of encountering unknown rooks, even in the most frequented seas, at depths which have never yet been sounded from the small number of ports in the world into which so large a ship can enter when loaded, and the smaller number that can furnish a full cargo for her, especially within the space of time which so costly a ship could afford to wait for it to be col-lected—it has been naturally inferred that such a snip cannot be profitably employed in any known branch of trade at the present time, at least with the chances of such a degree of success as can indemnify her owners for the hazards most wholly without any guidance from practical experience. But we learn from an interesting history of this enterprise, containing a detailed description of the structure of the ship, with copious illustration, lately published in the London Illustrated Times, that the project was not undertaken without calculation. It is there stated that the design of the construction of the Levisthan by Mr. Brunnel, its principal projector, by the im-possibility that any steamer hitherto built should carry her own coal for so long a voyage as from England to Australia, which, if practicable, would obviate the necessity of devisting from the run in the execution of a work so novel in its character, that most of it must be carried on almost direct course—a.d also, the loss of time consumed in taking in coal, with the ruinous expense thereby incurred. To enable a steamer to perform the Australian voyage, it is said to be necessary for her to have depots of coal at St. Vincent, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Mauritius, besides one in Australia for her return voyage. The coal for the supply of all those stations must be carried from England by means of a fleet of colliers despatched in advance, and when received on board at the expense of a material deviation from the direct route, it is essentially deteriorated in quality by repeated shiftings. It is stated that the best and quickest steamer hitherto constructed, which made the passage from England to Australia in sixty days, and obtained the prize as the fastest steamer that had made the voyage, lost £1000 by the operation, although she had a full cargo, and a full complement of passengers both ways.

It is added that other steamers have lost from £10,000 to £12,000 by the voyage, and that steam has ceased to be profitable in this trade, clippers having superseded them. y several routes, and that the direct ocean oute is the shortest, the following statement is quoted from the report of the Eastern Steam Navigation Company;-

The navigable distances from Lands End to Port Philip are as follows:--11.819 miles. Via Cape of Good Hope, " Cape Horn, Giberaltar, Malta Alexandria, Aden Point de Galle and Singapore, including transit through 12,084 " Panama, including transit 12,678 " across the lathmus, In view of these facts and others, tending to show the importance of an improved system of navigation for sustaining the intercourse with Australia, Mr. Brunnel went into a course of reasoning to show that to prosecute successfully a system of steam navigation between England and Australia, steamers should be built capable of taking on board on their departure from England a sufficient supply of coal for not only the onward, but for the return voyage. He assumed that a steamer to pursue a long voyage successfully with the fuel taken on board at her port of ieparture, should be of a tounage nearly equal to the number of miles measuring the length of the voyage. From reasoning on this hypothesis he came to the conclusion that a steamer to be adapted to the Austraulian trade should be of a burthen not less than 20,000 or 25,000 tons. For enpediency of providing it with not less than two independent propelling powers, and as the most effective made of giving sufficient strength to a vessel of the necessary length, he recommended the introduction of the principle of Mr. Rob-Bert Stephenson's tubular bridge, as the only mode of giving to the structure the greatest strength where it is most wanted. These three principles form the nucleus of the plan of the steamsnip Leviathan.

The design and construction of the iron hull of this ship is due to the genius of Mr. Scott Russell, the design being formed on the principle of "the wave line of construction," which was successfully introduced by him in England in the building of steamers some years ago, atter many years of study and experimental labor. It is stated that the Leviathan, so far as her lines are concerned, is but a magnified copy of the Little Wave boat built by Mr. Russell several years ago. In the article from which we derive most of the foregoing facts, it is stated that the principle of the wave line of construc-AMES PATTON, Jr., Federal street, Al- | tion was brought to the notice of the British association twenty-years ago, and that they then recognized the value of it. Mr. Russell subsequently demonstrated its value of building steamers upon the principle, two of which, it is said have been running for the last twelve months between New Haven and Dieppe, their average of speed in all weathers being seventeen miles an hour, and their maximum speed nineteen miles. Although partially introduced with success in steam vessels in England some years ago, the writer adds, "still predujdice opposed its introduction in the construction of our sailing vessels till the American clippers constructed on the wave line principle by Mr. McKay of Boston triumphantly demonstrated its value."

The Levisthan is so constructed as to be worked by three independent propelling powers, viz: the screw, the paddle engine, and the sail. Her screw propeller is 24 feet in diameter and of 36 tons weight, it being far the largest ever coustructed. The shatts destined to move the screw is 160 feet in length and of 60 tons weight and this shaft is to be put in motion by horizontal steam engines, each of a nominal horse diameter and 4 feet stroke. These are said to be the largest engines over built for marine purposes, each being a complete separate engines capable of working independently of the other and of working together, with a joint power of 6500 horses. In addition to the crew, acting with this power in pushing the ship forward from the stern, there will be on each side of her an immense paddle wheel of feet in diameter and weighing 185 tons—each wheel having 30 floats 13 leet by 3—each propelled by enormous engines, butlt by Mr. Scott Russell on the osciliating principle. These engines are of 1000 nominal norse power, with 5 cylinders or 74 inches diameter and 14 feet stroke, working 14 strokes a minute, and with steam in the boilers at 16 lbs, 16 strokes, giving a power by the paddle-engines of about 5000 horses. Each pair of cylinders form a complete separate engine, and each of the four cylinders is so constructed as to permit instant disconnection from the other
