WONDER OF THE WORLD_THE STEAMSHIP LEVIATHAN.

[OONOLUDED.]

The paddle engines have four tubular boilers with 400 brass tubes of 3 inches diameter, each boiler 17 feet 9 inches long, and 16 feet diameter, weighing about 50 tons, containing 40 tons of water. There are ten furnaces to each boiler, five on each side, and two boilers in each boiler room. Each boiler room is supplied with air by four ventilators or shafts, seven feet by five in width, which go to the upper deck, and are there grated over. The paddle boilers are in two distinct sets, each set with full firing capable of giving steam to the amount of 2500 horse power. There are besides two auxiliary condensing en-Put up in 25c. and 50c. The above are now acknowledged the gines capable of working with 160 horse power, for working pumps, and doing other necessary work of the ship. The coal bunkers on each side, above and between the boilers, are capable of containing about 12,000 tons of coal. At the estimated consumption of 180 tons per day of 24 hours, and on the supposition of making the distance of 12,-700 miles to Port Philip, at the rate of 18 miles an hour, there would be a consumption of 5400 tons in the outward voyage. leaving an equal quantity for the return voyage, with a surplus of 1200 tons for contingencies. Through the coa bunkers, in various places, tunnels are constructed to form a direct communication from one part

In addition to the provision for steam power, the ship has six masts for carrying sails of various dimensions, but as it is computed that the propulsion by steam will be at the rate of 18 miles an hour, it must be a rare occurence to be favored with a wind to accelerate this motion, and they are probably provided to aid the steering the ship, and for the contingency of getting out of fuel, or of some accident to the steaming apparatus. Five of the masts are of iron, and the rear one is of wood.

It would be difficult to give any description of this immense vessel, which without the aid of drawings would give any distinct idea of its peculiar construction. It is built exclusively of iron, with very trifling exceptions, and next to its size its most striking feature is its appearance of strength. Its principle dimensions are as follows:-680 feet. constitutes the entire raising of the structure of the ship, is performed with great rapidity-each plate before it is brought upon the ground heing snapped to such a pattern, and perforated fo the bolts with such exactness, as to bring out the skilfully designed outline, without any hazard of error. This result is of course produced by the previous study of the engineer, who forms model in wood of each place of the entire ship, hardly any of which are of the same form and by this model the iron plates of an inch in thichness are cut by the huge steam shears, with as much ease and more exactness than garments are shaped by a paper pattern. The plates, when shaped and perforated, are brought to their position by appropriate machinery. The first operator of a working party adjusted the place-the bolts, at a white heat, placed at his side, are inserted by him one by one, from the inside of the ship, and while it holds them in their position, by means of a heavy could be attained by no other force Another attendant keeps up the supply of heated bolts required. In this way the ship attains its dimensions by a gradual advance, hardly observable from day to day, without the apparatus of massive frames or machinery, the growing structure itself affording the principal support to the ne-cessary scaffolding and working machinery, and in due time the same processes in the structure of the bulkheads to form the compartments, the other partitions, the gangways and other work, which contribute to the strength and convenience of the ship when finished being made to its progress.
