A DOMESTIC STORY.

[CONTINUED.] scene of so much former happiness, he met Mrs. acids, bleaching powder, &c., the vapours of Esterling's servant girl going upon some house-hold errand. Stopping her with a number of eager questions to which she had no time to reply, he enatched from her hand the door key, his income was drawn, could with difficulty be nd sped along. Entering the house he went alnost unconsciously, by the force of old habit, towards that apartment which had once been his study. Its door stood a little open, and his atention was immediately arrested by voices withn, speaking in tones of deep and earnest feeling othing further to wish for?"

He knew the voice-it was hers. Gracious rovidence! what is this? "Well, then, I hall leave him to you for good. believe that he is all that he should be. Nay, lon't give way so, dearest girl." Basil pushed open the door-there before him stood Warkworth. Clinging to this man, with her arms around his neck, and looking up into his

He was gone out of the house he sprang, and rushed along the street, hatless, dishevelled, miles from the city, unknowing and uncaring ing of a friend than of a mere usher. peing to flee from the place where "a dagger of he mind" had been struck into him. Late in the evening he arrived at Edinburgh, and, as he wandered alone through the moonlit streets and squares of that romantic city, the genial to his taste. What he chiefly desired was tumult of his thoughts subsided, and he was en a situation of a literary nature, in connection abled to reflect calmiy and methodically upon the with a newspaper or periodical publication of "What a fortune is mine!" said he. I have iven myself wholly to the pursuit of pleasure, and, though it was of the intellectual kind, does that detract from the folly? I have shunned so ciety, and am as a stranger in the world. I have about two miles from a very large commercia allowed myself to become the slave of a passion, town in the west of England, and was placed in whose power and predominance in my mind at an exceedingly fertile and beautiful rural disthis moment, in spite of all that might naturally tend to queuch it, strikes me with wonder. I As to duplicity, treechery, dishonor, crime, infamy.

My object was happiness, and I have found mis-

I formed ideas of such a thing once, in my imagination, for the purpose of poetical amusement But now the experiment is made, and I know, "My father was wrong to leave me master of myself, as he did, without any one to advise me possessed of sufficient experience of this wicked world. And I was surely infatuated, to act as I did. It is done, however, now, and my heart is withered; henceforth I shall be a man without feeling. I shall never love again, never feel joy or sorrow—the only thing that remains for me now is to die. It would be impious to seek

From such ideas he new revolted-many were the reasons. In the first place, there was the fence of religion to be overleaped--that fonce which he had hitherto walked with scrupulous fidelity; moreover, there was to be procured some friend sufficiently devoted to his interests to embroil himself on his account in proceedings of a mortal nature and where the negotiations and investigations that must precede and follow such a measure, and, most hatful of all, the publicity that would be such as the publicity as the publicity that would be such as the publicity that would be such as the publicity that we such as the publi hateful of all, the publicity that would be ensured.
