THE DAILY POST. THE CONTRABANDIST'S REVENCE.

A CONFESSION.

[CONTINUED.] Some of us had followed the employment from our boyhood, but most were broken down characters like myself, who took it for their bread, but especially to be sure of a continual and plentiful supply of spirits. My knowledge of the processes, as conducted on a large scale, was deidedly an acquisition, and I speedily acquired much influence in the party Our apparatus was of the simplest description, light, and easily removed, for we had no fixed place of working, but saifted about as occasion demanded. It was a week here, and ten days there; now in an old barn, now in a hut in the middle of a bog; anon in some lonely cave in the mountains, among the rocks of the shore; but always within a convenient distance from this town, where the chief market of our produce lay. The prime step of the manufacture, previous to my joining them, had been the ruins of an old castle, about eighteen or twenty miles from the town, and a couple or so from the sea-cost .-One tower of it only remained standing, the rest being a heap of masses of stone and mortar .-Beneath this tower was a large, low-roofed vault, whose only proper vent was a square trap in the arch, through which you descended into it. In order, however, to admit a current of air for their furnaces, they had dug a hole through the thickness of the wall, which opened on the outside, close to the edge of a stream, and covered by brushwood and ivy.

This vault, however, was found to be so damp

as materially to interfere with the delicate processes necessary, as well as with the health of the operatives, some of whom caught their deaths there; and finally, though admirably adapted in so far as concealment went, it was abandoned. When I had been a few days connected with the set we found it most advantageous to ply the tradeat an old mill, which had been for some years in disuse. It is situated at a place called the Mill Hole, a wild spot on the coast, about twenty miles hence.

This place possessed peculiar points of merit.
It was surrounded landward by miles of mountainous, almost uninhabited moorland. A stream, coming from the hills, found its way to the sea beside it, washing its walls; and among the rocks through and over which it gushed were innumerable crevices, most suitable for concealment. Moreover, the sea, hard by, afforded every convenience for the transport of our commodities; and, possessed of all these advantages, we soon began to extend our speculations, and shortly attracted the attention of the authories of this town. Several licensed distillers formed a society for the suppression of the illicit trade, and kept a very high reward continually advertised for the conviction of offenders. The secretary of this scoiety, and he whose name was affixed to the placards offering the reward. was no other than my old acquaintance, Mr. Ormond, of the firm of Erris and Ormond.

But we were not very apprehensive of any immediate danger, as our agent in the town had especially informed us that we were not at all suspected. This person proved to be a traitor: the temptation of the reward was too strong for the seen at copper works; chester; Graff, the implants of the county.

The result was that early one morning, as a man named Quin and myself were engaged with the holding at the cold will be who was lying clore upon the buildings, at in the old mill, he, who was lying along upon the en years, and cora circular, We thought this might be the rest of our crew, who had gone up to the tower for some grain, having with them a light rickety cart or car with which we used to transport materials; but, containing over sixty lotters, testifying its superior durability out, and about a couple hundred yards off saw a party of military, accompanied by two civilians. One of these was an excise-officer; and the other was Ormond, in his capacity of secretary of the protection society. The instant they saw us they quickened their pace into a run. Ormond recognized me. I saw him pointing me out with violent gestulations to the officer that accompanied him. He was mounted on a blood-horse (an exceedingly beautiful animal,) and he immediately gave chase THEW BOOTS AND SHOES, I stood for a moment looking at him, my blood

DYE FLOUR.—15 bbls. just received and hency in first read over, probably by way of form, one or two papers. Immediately after they fell to work and demolished our whole apparatus.

All this while Ormond was riding about the All this while Ormond was riding about the CHIMNEY l'OPS of various patterns, for mill, interfering, directing, and making himself the busiest of all, appearing to be exulting in his work with a devilish glee.

And there was I, lying inactive on my oar, s spectator from a distance, while my last means OHEESE.—225 boxes prime W. R. cutting of earning my bread were being annihiliated by him who had already robbed me of every other thing—station, wealth, love! What could I have done to him that, not content with this, he should pursue me still with such rancor-persecute me with such exterminating malignity? I had raised him from the very dunghill, and sent him to my own place. Oh, ingratitude! most mortal of the sins that sink men's souls! surely from the smoke of the bottomless pit didst thou draw the deep dye that blackens thy hideous front! I felt as if struck dumb. While Quin, my companion, shricked oaths and maledictions at them across the water, I remained mute and calm, looking on,—but the state of my thoughts du-ring that fearful time! It was as if my whole mind were not an aggregate of faculties, as you philosophers will have, but one single dread passion, revenge! My heart beat slowly and laboriously—there seemed be be a dull heavy mass weighing down my bosom—my skin felt cold—I actually shivered. Then, in the silent thoughts of my own heart, I prayed to the fiend, that I felt was there at the time, that he would glut me to the teeth with vengeance, though I should perish with the surfeit.
