THE DAILY POST

BACKBONE. To dress, and sit, and walk genteelly,
To bow with ease and grace;
To speak in accents soft and mealy,
To wear a studied face;
These, and like goodly gifts and graces,
Are well en ugh, I own;
But what we want in this soft age, is Represented.

Bone-backbone. A heart to feel, a mind to think, A heart to feel, a mind to think,
Despite each base control;
A tongue to speak, a hand to work,
The purpose of the soul;
By these, and other goodly tokens,
If may be surely known,
If this or that, without the body,
Is bone—backbone.

Give me a man that's all a man,
Whe stands up straight and strong;
Who loves the piat and simple right,
And will not yield to wrong;
Who deats with firm, untrembling hand, To every one his own; Oh! a rlessed thing in anybody,

Is bone-backbone THE CONTRABANDIST'S REVENCE.

A CONFESSION.

[CONTINUED.] "Oh, Heaven reward your kind, trusting heart, Mr. Erris! I confess I have been than a fiend to you : but have mercy! I will give you a share in the trade-" A loud laugh of derision burst from me. "I will burn your father's will—I will assign back to you the whole property—only let me live, Master Philip, darling: don't murder! I will have him taken from the asylum where he is dying: he cannot come out except through me. Spare me!"

"Spare you! Will Heaven spare me for the deep sins you have driven me to-your murder among the rest?"

"Oh pardon, pardon! you may be happy yet, Master Philip. I will restore everything, ever jot, every farthing. I will serve you for life—be your slave. Oh, for the love of God in Heaven, don't kill me !" "Tell me, " said I, suppressing my emotions, "why did Ellen Lucas leave me for you?"

"Oh, young master, dear, if I tell you the truth, will you have mercy?" "Ask mercy of him whose affair it is, if you think he will give it to such a fiend incarnate .-

Answer my question, or I will dispatch you this instent." He started abruptly in the cart.
"I knew her before she became your father's servant. She lived with me before ever you saw her. It was all a scheme to better ourselves .-She gave me the money you gave her, and I lived upon it. We were not relations. Now will you let me go with my life, Mr. Philip? you Hee I am too despicable for your vengeance." I stopped my horse and jumped from my seat, to the ground. " Enough," said I ; " I have it all now." The deep, husky, unvatural sound of my voice as I said this struck terror to his heart. We had stopped close by a small tarn, or mountain lake, which lay with its black waters glassy and still, dimly palpable to the eye, in the thick, cold, moonless night,—looking like a deadly enake, coiled up and motionless, but with its fatal eye glancing upon you. "Oh!" cried he, "do not throw me in there, ied up in this way, dear Master Erris. It is horrible. Any death but such! Oh, will you; will you spare me? I will make restitution of every farthing-I will publicly acknowledge my villainy—I will submit myself to any punishment the law may inflict. I will-I swear before that God that sees us two, whom I believe in, and dread to meet! I will go with you to the high sheriff, and confess my frand; and not one word of this night will I ever breathe to ear of mortal! I can do no more Master Philip. Now won't you, won't you? I will take my oath to He was on his knees, bending forward his body, and looking upward in a suprlicating posture, while the tears streamed over his face. I stood looking at him for a while. Now I knew not as on the night when I might have shot him, unknown, in the dark street. His hands were fast behind his back, and his legs enciroled with the rope, from the knees to the ankles. There he knelt before me, utterly helpless: now looking at me, and now taking a glance at the dim, silent pool below "Oh, my good young master!" he continued. " what's the use of killing me? I could make you all you ever were. I swear I will do it; only I must live! I cannot die-I dare not. I shall be damned-I feel it-oh, mercy, mercy !" In there last words his voice rose to a maniacal cry of agonizing terror, while he twisted about, passing them rapidly under the cart, tied his feet fast to the axle, with his face downwards. All the while he continued hurried prayers for mercy, protestations, and piercing cries of despair. Springing again to my place in front of the cart, I gave the rein to the horse, and it moved. I heard his head and face, as, hanging down, they were dragged along, go knock, knock, on the stony hill-side: whilst his shrieks rang and echoed far away across the untrodden moorland. I was now in a franzy of excitement; that horse broke into a trot, a canter, a furious gallop, as, screaming, "Now—now you have it:

this is indeed a revenge,—full, glorious revenge into madness. Presently, the thick and murky MARD.—The subscriber, thankful to her night broke up; there were lightning, several peals of thunder, and a deluging fall of rain The poor herse was furious. On it flew like the wind, -while I clung to the cart, whipping it violence.

In this way we deshed along for about three miles, when one of the wheels went to pieces. I was thrown to the ground, and the horse, after staggering on a few paces, fell among the stones, KLEBER HAVING JUST RETURN and lay on its side struggling and kicking, smashing the remains of the cart, and the mutilated body of Ormond. All this time the rain continued to fall by bucketfuls. I sprang up, considerably bruised, but my bones all sound, and that was enough for me. My first proceeding was to out the rope-harness get him upon his feet, where he stood trembling was scarcely to be recognized, from the horri-

I now began to scheme how I should dispose of the shattered remains of my enemy: a moment, and my purpose was formed. Catching the rope that tied the lege, I dragged it around to where the horse stood. As I came close with it, he snuffed the air, and started, tugging at the halter with all his force. Seeing this, I bound a handkercheif over his eyes, and with a little difficulty succeeded in fixing it across his back. Jumping up behind it, I spurred towards the ses, and, after half an hour's gallop, reached the place where the hooker lay! TO BE CONTINUED.]
