of employment. A powerful and bitter resentment was rased against Mr. Basil on whis account in the minds of the laborers; but persuaded in his own mind of the ultimate benefit 'o maskind of the sub stitution of machinery for manual labor, he not only disregarded this, but, having first patented his inventions, endeavored to opread them as widely as possible.

In a certain district in the N rth of England in the neighborhood of a great manufacturing town there are several extensive paper-works The proprietors of these, having been induced to try Mr. Basil's patent, were so well pleased with its working as to invite him to a public disnet before his leaving the place, after seeing the machines put in motion. He had received many threatening letters from these whom his invention had for the time deprived of their living, and was given to understand that a combination for his destruction was afoot among them.

This, however, did not in any degree affect him, and, without the elightest bette of it or even making any precaution, he went to the party amid the hootings of an immense crowd of No. 86 Wood street. aboring people of every description, that beset the neighborhood.
