MRS. BADGERY

"I don't wish to do anything uncivil, ma'am;" aid I. "But I am a single man, and I am not entimental. (Mrs. Badgery groancd.) Nobody old me I was coming into a shrine when I took his house; nobody warned me, when I first went that there was a heart in passession. I iver it, that there was a heart in possession. I regret to have disturbed your meditations, and I im sorry to hear that Mr. Badgery is dead. That your kind permission, I will do myself the ionor of wishing you good morning, and I will yo up stairs and look at the fixtures on the second floer."

Could I have spoken more compassionately to a woman whom I sincerely believed to be old and ugly? Where is the man to be found, who can lay his hand on his heart, and honestly say that he ever really pitted the sorrows of a Gorgon? Search through the whole surface of the globe, and you will discover human phenomena of all sorts, but you will not find that man.

I to the second floor, walked into the back room rst, and inspected the grate. It appeared to a a little out of repair, so I stooped down to look at closer. While I was kneeling over the ook at closer. While I was kneeling over the ars, I was violently startled by the fall of one arg, I was violently startled by the fall of one arg, I was violently startled by the fall of one arg, I was violently startled by the fall of one arg, I was violently startled by the fall of one arg, I was violently a start of the pool of my head. I turned on my knees and coked up. Heavens and earth! the crape covered woman had followed me up stairs—the ource from which the drop of warm water had allon was no other than Mrs. Eadgery's eye. "I wish you could contrive not to cry ever the op of my head, ma'am," said I. My patience ecoming exhausted, and I spoke with considerable asperity. The curly headed youth of the resent age may not be able to sympathize with my feelings on this occasion; but my bald brother know, as well as I do, that the most unpardonable of all liberties is a liberty taken with the negarded top of the human head.

over my head, ma'sm," I repeated more irrily than before.
'This was his dressing room,' said Mrs. Badg'idulging in a muffled soliloquy. "He was gularly particular about his shaving-water.

always liked to have it in a little tin pot, and invariably desired that it should be placed on shob." She groaned again, and tapped one sof the grate with the leg of her camp-stool. I had been a woman, or if Mrs. Badgery been a man, I should now have proceeded to ny own house by an appeal to physical force. der existing diroumstances, all that I could was to express my indignation by a glance, glance produced not the elightest resulting wonder. Who can look at a woman with y effect, through a crapo voll?
cretreated late the second floor front room, instantly shut the door after me. The next ment I heard the rustling of the crape gar-nts outside, and the muffled voice of Mrs. lgery poured lamentably through the key er it, that there was a heart in possession. I

To resume. I made her a bow, and left her a the camp stool, in the middle of the drawing om floor, exactly as I had found her. I ascendagarded top of the humon head.

Mrs. Badgery did not seem to hear me. When a had dropped the tear she was standing exactover me, looking down at the grate; and she was stirred an inch after I had spoken. "Don't was the proper first had spoken."

Do you mean to make that your bed-room?" ted the voice on the other olds of the door. h don't, don't make that your bed-room! I am ng away directly—but, oh pray, pray let t one room be sacred! Don't sleep there! If can possibly help it, don't sleep there!" opened the window, and looked up and down road. If I had seen a policemen within hail could certainly have called him in. No such son was visible. I shut the window again, I warned Mrs. Badgery through the door, in sternest tones, not to interfere with my detic arrangements. "I mean to have my estead put up here," I said. "And what is ee, I mean to sleep here" And what is more, ean to snore here!" Sovere, I think that last ence? It completely crushed Mrs. Badgery he moment. I heard the crape garments ling away from the door; I heard the muffled ins going slowly and solemnly down the stairs nd due course of time I also decended to the and floor. Had Mrs. Badgery really left the nises? I looked into the front parlor—empty. k parlor-spinty. Any other room ou the ind floor? Yes; a long room at the end of passage. The door was closed. I opened autiously, and peeped in. A faint scream the smack of two distractedly clasped hands ted my appearance. There she was again he camp stool, again sitting exactly in the dle of the floor.

Don't, don't lock in in that way!" cried by Badgery, wringing her hands. "I could it in any other room, but I can't bear it is. Every Monday morning I looked out things for the wash in this room. He was cult to please about his linen; the washernan never put starch enough in his collars atisfy him. Oh, how often and often has he ped his head in here, as you popped yours ust now; and said, in his amusing way, ore Starch! Oh, how droll he always was on year, you doll in this day, little headw very, very droll in this dear little back said nothing. The situation had now got and words. I stood with the door in my d, looking down the passage towards the gar-and waiting degredly for Mrs. Badgery to ut. My plan succeeded. She rose, signed, tup the camp-stool, stalked along the pass, paused on the door mat, said to herself, et, sweet spot!" descended the steps, grean-ong the grayel walk, and disappeared from at last, through the garden door. woman who kept the house. Sho curtiseyed trembled. I left the premises, satisfied my own conduct under very trying circumes, delusively convinced, atso, that I had with Mrs. Badgery.
