

AGRICULTURAL.

Manures.

Farm-yard manure is generally made up of the solid and liquid excrements of animals, some in a state of decomposition, and the remainder fresh and unchangeable. There exists a great difference of opinion as to whether it is most advantageous to use long or fresh manures, rather than that which is completely rotted. The difficulty is capable of adjustment. If the intention be only to benefit the immediately succeeding crop, the manure should be completely rotted; but long manure, if ploughed in and covered, is more beneficial to future crops; it is much preferred for potatoes, for rotten manures make them watery and worm-eaten. If the object be to furnish the greatest amount of organic matter to the soil the sooner the application is made the better. On compact clays the mixture of straw and coarse manure is beneficial, rendering them loose and light, while the products of decomposition are more completely retained than in a looser soil. Coarse manure makes loose soils looser and loses more of its elements in decomposing; for this reason compact, ferment manures are best on such soils. For crops which grow rapidly and mature in a short time, well fermented manures and fine composts are more immediately felt; turnips, buckwheat, clover, and many garden vegetables, might almost mature before decomposition would be sufficiently advanced in new and coarse manures to do them any benefit. When it is desired to force or quicken a crop, a well fermented or fine heating manure should be used, as rich compost, bone dust, or manure of horse and sheep. The straw of wheat, oats, &c., contains a mixture of saline substances, which is exceedingly valuable as manure to almost every crop; the same is true of their chaff. It is more economical generally to rot the straw and chaff in the barn-yard, instead of dissipating all their volatile matter in the air; when buried dry they decompose slowly, and produce a less sensible effect on the succeeding crop. During fermentation an unavoidable loss of organic and of saline matter takes place. It is, therefore, theoretically true of dry as well as of green vegetable matter, that it will add most to the soil if ploughed in previous to fermentation. Yet this is not the only consideration for a practical man; instead of a slow and prolonged action on his crops, he may require an immediate and powerful one for a shorter time, and to obtain this, may be justified in fermenting his straw with the certainty even of a loss. Thus the dispute about the application of long or short manures becomes altogether one of expediency and practical economy. Chaff partakes of the nature of straw, but decomposes even more slowly when buried dry. It is also difficult to ferment even when mixed with liquid manure. The main general difference between vegetable manure of the same kind, cut at the same age, and applied in a green or dry state is this: the former decomposes more rapidly, and therefore acts more speedily; the total effect in either case will probably be very near the same. But if the vegetable matter had been cut at a more advanced stage, or been exposed to the weather while drying, it will no longer exhibit the same efficacy. A ton of dry straw cut green will be much richer than if cut ripe and dry; not only because the green plant contains the materials from which the grain is afterwards formed, but because as the plant ripened it restored to the earth a portion of the saline matters it originally extracted. After it is cut, every shower that falls on it washes out a portion of the salt contained in its pores. (See Scientific Agriculture, by Rogers; Johnston and Brown's Field Book, 223.) All those troublesome pests, the robbers of our fields, should be cut down in their greatest vigor and laid in the barn-yard or pig sty to decay; they are rich in fertilizing salts, and whenever and however applied, are valuable as manure. It almost surpasses our calculation to estimate the damages done to crops by weeds, and the consequent advantages of destroying them in their bloom; almost every species produces millions of seeds which are wafted to far distant spots; they shade and occupy the soil, and by their superior vigor drain out the sustenance prepared for more delicate plants, and at last smother them.

The remains of plants with the excrement and carcasses of animals, if returned to the earth before decomposition, must contain all the mineral, organic and gaseous matters which the animals derive from their food, or the plants from the soil. The solid matters must all pass through the process of decomposition, before they assume their original, gaseous or earthy forms, and become food for plants. The science of manuring consists in applying to the soil those elements which have been taken up by growing crops; the richest manures may be applied to a falling soil, and if they lack the particular elements which the crop require, and which the soil does not contain, the field grows barren. Farm-yard manure probably contains the greatest number of elements necessary to fertility; but for their full development particular plants require special manures.

Manures operate beneficially in various ways: First—By serving in some instances as food for plants. Second—By causing chemical changes in the soil by which other substances are prepared to be taken up as food. Third—By neutralizing noxious substances in the soil, which prevent the growth of crops. Fourth—By their bulk and texture they change the mechanical properties of soils.

The will of Jabez Barber, of Chicago, who with his wife and oldest daughter were passengers on the ill-fated Pacific, was opened on the 15th inst., before the Judge of probate. The bulk of his property, amounting to $250,000, will fall to the only surviving child, a little girl of three years old.

"Fall from grace," as the Irishman said—then he slipped off a lard barrel.

IMPORTANT TO HOUSEKEEPERS AND FRUIT GROWERS.—ARTHUR'S PATENT AIR-TIGHT SEALING CANNS AND JARS, for Preserving Fruits, &c. This invention for which a patent has been obtained, commends itself to the attention of Housekeepers and others, inasmuch as it is accomplished in a very desirable and useful manner.

THE cans and jars are constructed with a channel sealing the mouth, near the top, into which a very adhesive compound, prepared for the purpose and allowed to harden. In order to seal the vessel hermetically, it is only necessary to heat the cover slightly and press it into place. It may be opened with as much ease as it is closed, by slightly warming the top. The ordinary tin cans, used for the same purpose for which this is intended, cannot be closed, as well known without the aid of a hammer, are difficult to open, and are generally so much injured in opening as to be useless for future service.

By this simple contrivance, the process of hermetical sealing is placed conveniently within the reach of every individual, and fruit, vegetables and butter (if properly prepared) may be kept with their natural flavor unimpaired, for an indefinite length of time. For sale by
