

THE RAFTSMAN'S JOURNAL.

ADDRESS OF THE CARRIER OF THE RAFTSMAN'S JOURNAL.

Oh! come, dearest Patrons, and listen to the lay,
The printer boy warbles upon this New-Year's day;
And while your hearts are merry at the notes I do peal,
May your hands reach your pockets and there begin to feel.

If there's not a stray quarter lying in the way,
That would just moisten the views of the Carrier Boy to-day,
Through the press that is past I have brought you the news,
A reward for such kindness, no man will refuse.

Time is a register appointed of the Lord,
Which having done his bidding here, returns to record;
So the year Fifty-Six has been here and is gone,
And young Fifty-Seven is just coming on.

The scenes of the past I most certainly will tell;
A peep at the future I may give you as well.
The past has been various as you do well know,
Amid sunshine of gladness and dark clouds of woe.

How many who, like me, with bright prospects ahead,
Commenced the last year, that are now with the dead;
And their spirits are gone to meet deserved doom,
While their bodies lie low in the cold dreary tomb.

These dead bodies will rise at the last Judgment day,
And united to spirit, will doomed pass away.
Yet those only are blessed who on the King wait,
Strive, therefore, to enter at the straight narrow gate.

From these issues, we might learn our duty below;
But I stay not to warn you, as onward I go,
From the land of the dead, where my thoughts did just roam,
I will now soar aloft to the scenes of my home.

From the first of last year I will therefore begin,
And tell you of Clearfield—its Clearfield we are in.
The old year came by covered with its snow,
And the girls with the boys did a sleigh-riding go.

Just while the snow lasted, these lessons were clever,
But when it departed, they got saucy as ever.
The snow did all melt and run down off the hills,
And a large Raftsmen's river was formed of the rills.

We beheld the ice break—what a beautiful sight!
To see it descending in the strength of its might.
Some faint hearts were timid, lest the bulk of the snow,
When melted would deluge our fair town, lying low.

But the hand that protects and defends us from harm,
Soon made us see thence we had no cause of alarm;
The snow melted slowly and did gently depart,
To the full satisfaction of the Lumberman's heart.

The sound of the sleigh-bells was then heard of no more;
But the din of the Raftsmen was all along shore.
They tossed in the logs, with a roll and a splash,
And a stout stick for binder across them did lash.

Equipped for their journey, they cut loose from the shore;
So the season for rafting soon gently passed o'er;
And tho' their labor is hard, in shine and through rain,
Yet they long for the season of rafting again.

Now swiftly we glide through the days of bright Spring,
When the blue-birds and robins their sweetest notes sing,
Still on towards Summer, when all nature looks gay,
Chosen young maids were crowned fair Queens of the May.

As time rolled along there was an Exhibition,
In which a youth spoke of "Our Country's Condition";
But our wire-working neighbor thought that would never do,
So he gave things in general a hell-a-haloo.

Yet nay shall not trace this inconsistent wrong;
But will hasten to speak of political wrong;
To th' town of Cincinnati the Democrats did ride,
With Slavery and Popedom upon their either side.

For these are their legions in this beloved land;
Thus the curses of our nation are linked hand in hand.
They voted for Douglas, Buchanan, Cass and Pierce,
Amid party factions, alarming, loud and fierce.

They cling to New Hampshire's son, till he had but three.

Then cast him overboard into dark oblivion's sea;
And finding that success required a better man,
They placed the aged "Buck" in the Union-saving van;

A platform they did make, so squatter-sovereign wide,
Polygamy and Slavery were swallowed tall and hide.
This platform endorsed the acts of tittle Frank;
Buchanan imbibed all, not choked at any plank.

Our Millard Fillmore next was made a nominee;
A most noted statesman and worthy man he be.
Unhappily his friends in their platform did refuse,
To assert Northern wrong, and reclaim plighted dues.

A party thence arose, who knew and spoke their wrong,
Whose standard, fair and just, the Northern hosts did throng,
That 'twas just and fair, but the knave would dare disown,
It claimed no Southern right, but asked for such its own.

This party as their chief, Fremont did nominate;
In statesmanship a youth, in knowledge truly great,
The bloodshed, feuds and death, which jar'd our country's weal,
Their platform charged upon the Compromise repeal.

Three parties thus equipped, the canvass all began;
In quick succession then, we had lies, truth and fun.
All things they said and did, time here would fail to tell;
But our ears were scarce free from the Union-servers' yell.

They called the wrongs of Kansas, "Abolition lies,"
And scoffed at prisoners' woes, and widows' prayers and cries;
Then for success did brand, Fremont a Catholic.
Who does not now behold this Locofoco trick?

They court the Roman vote, then meanly sue his name,
To libel the inster of their great opponent's fame.
This plan to 'lectioneer may suit their party well;
But reminds me of the way "Nix" makes converts for Hell.

Fremonters did assert that Slavery ought not be,
In our Northern territory, forced upon the free.
And 'twas not necessary cruel bondage should ride,
With our Eagle and Flag, where'er they soar in pride.

How Kansas suffered wrong at Border-Ruffian hands;
How the blood of freemen stained her fair prairie lands;
How halibut-voiced usurers, aimed slavery there to chain;
Were topics of dispute throughout the late campaign.

All parties ran in hope; that one did win the prize,
Whose stronghold is the Pope, and refuge of lies.
But why should Salt-River boys, while rowing, complain,
Along with th' noble crowd from Iowa to Maine.

I next shall notice Brooks—fell villain of the land—
Who caned worthy Sumner, with most treacherous hand,
And caused his blood to flow within the Congress Hall,
Whose memory shall be great—but Brooks' shall be small.

Th' affairs of our nation have been moving apace,
A few things to honor, all others to disgrace;
Our internal troubles, it is likely, may cease,
And instead of war with Europe, prospects favor peace.

The world in general is lying at her ease;
But here and there are some her doings do not please.
Her changes are too numerous for me to recall,
In the history of nations, they are written for all.

Come now with me return to the prospects of home,
Where my thoughts for the present at random shall roam.
A Rail Road we will have, for the contract is made,
That near twenty-two miles shall soon have the right grade.

The most spreading thing, of new fashion, we now meet,
Are the hoops of our girls, which take up the whole street.
Look out, boys, in passing, or these hoops you will feel;
You should have your stuns lashed with wrought-iron or steel.

Our town, for the most part, is as dull as you please;
Some men laboring hard, whilst others enjoy ease.
It is hoped this New Year will make dullness depart;
May each lad have his lassie, each lass a sweetheart.

And now, dearest patrons, ere my lay shall be done,
You will kindly think o'er how the first part begun!
My Address is delivered, I cannot delay;
A happy New Year to all—a to all a good day.
