Wherever I may go. For there I've known life's sweetest joy, And sorrows fiercest pains: Love made my bliss but to destroy, My tears have fell like rain : The maid was modest, timid, coy,

And loved me well again. No other could I ever love. My first and only flame : My heart, as faithful as a dove, Was echo to her name; The chorus she to every song

The chord to every strain. Adila is the sweetest name That ever yet was sung; 'Tis ever throbbing in my heart; 'Tis ever on my tongue;
The first and last upon my mind,
Amidst the old and young.

I love her well, with all my might, And more I cannot say:
Of her I'm dreaming all the night,
And thinking all the day; Even when I lift my voice to praise, Or when I kneel to pray.

My love was not a morning flower That shuts before 'tis noon: My love was not a rainbow shower That disappears as soon : Nor is it yet the painted bower That yields us no perfume. But it is constant, it is true, As fairy tales declare :

There's music in my heart for you, And sunshine reigning there; And you have nothing else to do Than all that bliss to share. I held you gently to my breast, Just like a caged bird; You 'gainst my heart your bosom press'd, But never spoke a word; I saw your soul beyond control, By honest passion stirred.

And then I gently spoke of love, You owned the magic name; Your eyes all bright with inward light Revealed the ardent flame; And you and I were one to be When winter came again.

You've broken now your vows to me, You've taken back your word; I cannot count myself so free, The adamantine chord Which bound our hearts, is yet to be A thing to be abhorred.

O! what a fount of gushing wo From this one thought is started; More bitter words I ne'er shall know. Than these, that "We have parted. And now a wanderer I go, Forsaken, broken hearted.

I cannot live without thy love, And every hope is dying.

The world cannot this grief remove,
That dearest boon denying.

1 chase the shadowy phantom still, The shade keeps ever flying.

O! keep this truth within your heart, ('Tis not an idle notion.)
That few have loved as I have loved. So holy with emotion. My soul is consecrate to thee

In loves sincere devotion. The sun may warm the turtle's nest, The dew revive the flowers, The grass may all the greener grow From Summer's genial showers, And words of love cheer other hearts Less desolate than ours.

Yet. O fare-well, inconstant one. O! fare-thee-well, forever-With ruthless hands you sever ; You've crushed my fond hopes, one by one, I'll hope no more-no never.

When memory ponders on the past, I cannot help but weep; Those moments were too sweet to last, Too precious long to keep; Now all is crushed before the blast, Like visions in our sleep.

Strong were the ties that bound our hearts. And strong the chain you sever; With spirit strong I labored long To keep the links together; O! effort vain, this very chain Is broken now forever.

With genial sun and gentle rain The drooping flowers may flourish, The imprisoned bird may sing again, Good news fond hopes may nourish;

But sun and showers and news are vain; Without thee I must perish. Thy heart was mine, and mine was thine, And Hymen's bonds had yoked them, If truths were ever in our souls, That was the time they spoke them ;

If loves were ever in our hearts, Then Cupid's fires awoke them. Yet go, but with thee ever bear My love without deflection; When other days shall come with care. You'll think of this rejection; For love like yours, I may declare.

Must have its resurrection The wintry blasts may o'er it blow, The frosts its leaves be drying. Its head be covered o'er with snow, Cold winds around it sighing. The trunk still lives, again to grow,

For true love knows no dying Where love the fond heart once has wrung, Its wounds may have no closing; But all in vain, 'twill hide the pain, In vain 'twill shut its woes in And nurse its grief, and shun relief, For love has no reposing.

My being in thine own was bound, With us love had its revel; I thought together hand in hand Life's wildering maze to travel; I thought together, heart to heart, Its mysteries to unravel.

Now life is drawn from out my soul By words that you have spoken, The vows my spirit rested on You wickedly have broken. Of future overhanging wo

I seem to see the token It seems that, prophet like, I see, (There's sadness in the vision,) One who devotedly loved me, (O earth was then elysian,) The wife in covenant to be, Now wronging her decision

And in that wrong she drives the steel Deep into her own bosom : And from that wrong she yet shall feel, (0 strange, 0 dire confusion,) A thousand things that must reveal How great was her delusion.

And while I gaze, a loneliness Is o'er her spirit creeping : And darkness gathers round her path ; Her soul is sad, and weeping; And for the one she truly loved, Its faithfulness 'tis keeping.

Repenting, that in evil hour Her jealous spirit hasted To dash the joys of love before Their sweets she well had tasted ; And now she sets, and grieveth for

The precious boon she wasted She sits beside the open door, She sits, and looketh mainly For one, whose shadow on the floor She'll ever look for vainly; Alas, her heart, he'll come no

Whom she dismissed disdainly. She did not mean the thing she said, She muttered, only muttered; For coals were burning in her head, Her heart so wildly fluttered; Now if she could, she'd sink like lend The things that then she uttered.

She'd give the world, could she recall The bitter words then spoken; She'd give the world to kindle all The loving ties then broken: But vainly now she seeks a peace The former things revoking.

I would not be that weary thing For all the gains we borrow; With not a joy to cheer her now, With no hope for to-morrow; But desolate with eating care, And heart earoding sorrow

She mourneth now from evedill morn. From morn till eve she grieveth. Light to her eyes doth not return; No more her soul receiveth Those words of love it rested on ; And hope her sad heart leaveth.

A wron t was done to one she loved, And pride led her to boasting. I see that wrong come back to her, As fowls come home for roosting. With sorrow stung, her soul is wrung, Her heart is nigh to bursting.

O! why has love so strong, so true, In human hearts a resting. May Heaven in mercy look to you, And grant you this requesting; And with its grace, your soul subdue, From self and sin divesting.

Yet, fare-thee-well, I would not hold A false one to yows plighted; Yes, fare-well-but, 'tis not the mould Of earth, has disunited Our loving hearts, but broken vows, And promises all slighted.

Fare-well, in pathways far apart Our lives are now divided ; And yet we must be joined in heart, Fate has it so decided: My soul turns not away from thee

In whom it has confided. From thee my heart its bliss has drawn. To thee 'tis ever turning; Thy word it ever rested on, No faithlessness discorning; And none but you my soul would woo, With honest passion burning.

The same warm sun may o'er us shine, The same pale moon be beaming; The stars above shall mark our love, Their mild light round us gleaming : Our souls shall meet, and often greet

Each other in our dreaming. Alas too soon they will commune With days of former gladness; And then recall the kind words all, As well the words of madness; And this shall beat to fiercer heat,

This never ending sadness. Again fare-well, the wrong that's past, fear will have no mending; And broken vows have come between Two souls in union blending; And broken hearts, and withered hopes, And sorrows thick descending.

Yes go, a weary one, and lone, This parting seemeth fitter;
With leaden steps we'll wander on,
For love hath lost its glitter;
And gathering clouds shut out the sun; Life's waters, too, are bitter. The soul must seek, among the meek,

A true, congenial spirit; Its only rest is a faithful breast; Its only trust, true merit : We must esteem, and faithful deem. Where we love's joys inherit. In marble walls, and painted halls,

Where wealth and rank sat dining, I've had a place, and there could trace The heart for true love pining. O! 'tis not wealth, nor rank nor pelf, That makes the souls clear shining.

But 'tis the soul-lit beaming eye, The sweet lip's fond caressing, That gives the soul its eestacy Love's holy bliss possessing; O here is joy without alloy For love is life's true blessing.

Our dearest home is in the heart, The heart with true love teeming; Our light is only from the eye With warm affection beaming; Our bliss will flow from faithful lips With smiles forever gleaming.

Mine was a heart that beat for you With honest love awakening; A faithful breast where you might rest; Of that true love partaking; Your earthly bliss must be in this, A love that knows no shaking. The night-bird gives her sweetest song,

The thorn her bosom stinging; In saddest notes our numbers float When love the heart is wringing; My soul transpierced with arrows sharp, Its requiem is singing. My ardent love has built my tomb,

And raised my funeral pyre; I've gathered much, I've gathered long, And piled it high, and higher, Now, Phoenix like, I flap my wing. And perish in the fire.

My dying song shall be for thee, My heart's last beat be thine; May love as true as mine for you Around thee still entwine ; To quell each fear, and dry each tear, With tenderness like mine.
