TO THE FIRST VIOLET. O, Violet! O, Violet! Unclose your axure tinted eyes,
Still with the dew of the morning wet,
And give us news from Paradise! The monthly wheel twelve times has turned Since last we saw your face below; And of a surety you have learned Some things of which we do not know O. Violet! O, Violet! Unloose your velvet lips of speech— Tell me where you went and who you met In lands that lie beyond our reach.

The lost loved-little ones and all Whose fingers rest on harps of gold-Can you no word of theirs recall? Is there no message to be told? O. Violet! O, Violet!

Close up your azure tinted eyes; Your silence proves you could forget The message sent from Paradise.

Woman and Masoury.

"It is with reverence akin to awe that I approach this subject, knowing that, for -a mystery that is as sacredly guarded to day as it was thousands of years ago, when the mantle of silence shrouded the germ of the mystic brotherhood, and will be for ages to come, so long as two hands are left on earth to meet in the clasp of fraternal love. Though this veil must hang before us through all time—shrouding from our unworthy eyes the "Holy of Holies," though no woman's foot may ever tread the sacred aisles—no woman's eye gaze on the glories of the inner Shrine-yet we are not entirely shut out. The glory of the Shecina shines afar-even on the brow of womanhood. Though admitted to the outer courts-to the vestibule of the Temple, whose foundation is charity whose pillars are Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty, and whose summit is the approaching smile of God himself, it is meet that one should tell what Masonry has done for woman. And she who proudly boasts of the title of a "Mason's Daughter" now asks the privelege to be that one.

It is folly to attempt to tell you what Masonry is. You, who hold all its mysteries in your hand—its secrets in your heart—and with your eye can trace through all its labarynth of ways and means. Masonry, that is as incomprehensible to us as the vital principle of Life—but, like Life, is known to us by results. "By their fruits ye shall know them," and it is the fruits of Masonry that woman eats, while the labor and toil are spared her. She basks safely in the sunshine of its blessings, guarded and watched over by a band of more faithful than, lover, brother or husband.

There is a strange facination to us, who naturally love the wonderful, the brave, the strong-in the thought of this vast League, so innumerable in action. Like the religion of Jesus, on which the principles of Mason-ry are founded, it has marched with steady footsteps down the long vista of years, and has made every obstacle a stepping-stone to its present glory. Christianity went alone and insulted from the hill of Calvary to the tomb of Joseph, land now waves her sceptre over the world when the tomb of the Cæsars has mouldered back into dust. Mason-ry, her more earthly sister, with hushed breath and noiseless footstepwalked scathless through fires of oppression, and storms of prejudice and falsehood, and now divides with her the sceptre of the world.

The Church has many false brethren-in Masonry this is impossible. The one, being the nursery of the spiritual, necessarily more intangible in its creeds, and often receives within its folds the vilest impostors, whose only merit is their power to deceive. the volume of my heart, and read the rec-The other, though founded upon Divine laws, is a human institution, and deals that, though on the awful stillness of that dread tribunal there falls no whisper of reproach, his life condemns him to his very face, and he yields unansweringly to the just Show me a tie on earth more binding than the boon of Masonry. There is none. The Christian may forget his sacramental vows, and turn his back upon the Saviour who has died for him; the husband may turn from the wife of his bosom, whom he has sworn before high Heaven to cherish, even to the portal of the grave; the father may forget his child, whose blue eyes once held all Heaven for him; the brother may neglect the tender sister that shared the cradle of his infancy, the mother's "good hight" kiss, and the gambol around the father's knee, a son may even look coldly upon the mother that bore him; but the voice morn at this altar can never be revoked! Time or distance cannot annul it; and the wretch who would seek to violate, would be branded with a sign more indellible than that of Cain. No land would be remote though for his escape, no jungle wild enough for his retreat, no cavern deep enough to There is something sublime in this that

tion surround her? She has but to speak | 7 and a hundred arms are bared in her defense; and, with only the talisman of her womanly purity, she can walk the earth with the freedom of a goddess and the sanctity F. of a saint.

There is a jealousy in the minds of some women as to Masonry, which often amounts to bitter prejudice—for they regard it as a rival, and, in a woman's eyes, a rival is the one intolerable thing-even though it were an angel. Wishing, as it is their nature to, to reign supreme in one heart, they are disappointed to find Masonry already enshrined there—and they cannot help but hate her. But leniant with this fault, I pray you. She errs, not so much through excess of hate to all Masons, as through excess of love for one. And I am not sure that the loved one may not be to blame, in a measure, for this. He may have made this magic word a cloak to hide some wayward step-for, outside of their invisible barrier, Masons are very much like other men.

the natural impulses of her heart, but let her once accept the truth into her soul, and she will die for it. But the prejudiced ones | 160 ages, there has hung between the sex that I represent and the subject of which I would speak, a veil of deep impenetrable mystery that woman hears nothing of it till it is brought home to her; but then it lodges there forever-its memory can never die. She sees that power which could overturn an empire, stoop, in its gentleness, to dry her children's tears. She sees the ear that 433 listens calmly to the voice of Kings, and the counselings of sages bend tenderly to hear | 161 116 her meek complaint.

Woman is slow to be convicted against

O, who can tell what Masonry has done 296 125 for woman! Where are the records of its 328 153 work, like snow fall in its silence, like the everlasting hills in permanence? Not on perishable paper leaves can this be written, not in the printed annals of the day is blazoned forth the story of this charity, most beautiful, most God-like. But by a million firesides is the story whispered by the father's thin, pale lips—it is recorded deep up-on the widow's heart—it is repeated in the orphan's prayer.

But this has ever been. "The poor ye have always with you." Would you read a record yet more forcible? Go to the battlefield, and in the midst of the most fright. 5764 1000 ful carnage, see a man risk his life and limb | 5618 61 to succor one-not his bosom friend, not his companion in arms, nor yet his mother's son—but his brother, though he never looked upon his face before. He has recognized the mystic sign, and life has but this one purpose, to relieve this stranger brother. Go to the hospitals, and see the dim eyes trighten and the pale lips smile to meet the beloved signal they alone can read. Hear the nurses tell of the strange peace that steals over the fevered minds, the trusting, childlike security under which their wounded rest, and then ask what is Masonry?

"What has this to do with woman?" Everything. Does it not reach the seat of her dearest affections by ministering to those dearer to her than her own life? When the long-looked-for letter comes, dated in a hospital—written by a strangers hand, but dictated by the lips of their own loved soldier boy, telling the watchful care and attention bestowed upon by his Brothers of the Order, think you the loving women that cluster round that hearth-stone forget the name of Masonry when they pray? If so, you little know woman's heart.

Masons, let me but once give voice to the thousand unuttered blessings that woman breathes for you, and in me see the symbol of the gratitude they cannot speak. I care not for the mysteries of Masonry-in my soul I know is one grand principle. Charity, sweet charity! of which the Saviour said: "It is the greatest of all these." To add another proof that even "a cup of water" shall not be forgotten, I will unfold ord there. I have seen my childhood's dearest idolwith human attributes—things that can be one only sister—fading slowly away from seen and heard, and known by men—that me, going back to our mother's bosom one only sister-fading slowly away from can be grasped by the great over-ruling and through all the long years that have intervened, and through all that are to come, I never can forget a few clusters of grapes, so grateful to her fevered lips, sent in the name of Masonry. If I were a man, I'd be a Mason. As am a woman, I can only do what is allowed me. The prayers of a wid-owed mother shall add one more ray to the lustre of your reward, for God himself said: calls forth Woman's ardent admiration; but "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me.' -Carrie Carlton.
