THE UNSEEN.

About us float the odorous gales
That kiss the eternal hills of day; Oh, that the chilling fog would lift, And show our waiting feet the way!

We grope about us—seeing not
The waiting ones outside our sight,
Whose viewless hands are clasping ours
Te lead us up the shining height.

We may not know the cords we touch, That, glaneing 'long the electric line, Flash back upon our sodden lives, Some hints of peace and love divine. As elefted mountains sometimes hide Behind the vapor's gurgling drift, Til, pierced by Sol's director ray, Their girdling shadows slowly lift. So we grope on, 'neath fogs of doubt, Our hearts in solemn silence bowed;

While God's eternal verities
Are hidden from us by a cloud. When lo! a kindling glory throws A sudden splendor o'er our way; And, slowly lifting, le, apppear The whitely shining hills of day!

And yet not oit—not yet to all,
These propecies and hints are given,
Only as signals, sparsely set.
Along the battlements of Heaven.

Yet some day, every waiting soul, Shall see the mists slow rolling back.

And, freed from clogs of earth and sin,

Walk caimly up the shining track!

HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY.

It was six o'clock in the afternoon. At this time the great wholesale warehouse of Messrs. Hubbard & Son was wont to close. unless the pressure of business compelled the partners to keep open until later. The duty of closing generally devolved upon Edward Jones, a boy of fourteen, who had lately been engaged to perform a few light duties, for which he received the sum of fifty dollars annually. He was the "boy," but if he behaved himself so as to win the approbation of his employers, his chance for promotion was good.

Yet there were some things that rendered this small salary a hard trial to him-circumstances with which his employers were not acquainted. His mother was a widow. The sudden death of Mr. Jones had thrown the entire family upon their own resources, and they were indeed but slender.

There was an elder sister who assisted her mother to sew, and this, with Edward's salary, constituted the entire income of the family. Yet by means of untiring industry, they had contrived thus far to live, using strict economy, of course. Yet they had wanted none of the absolute necessities of

But Mary Jones-Edward's sister-grew sick. She had taken a severe cold, which had terminated in a fever. This not only cut off on the income arising from her own labor, but also prevented her mother from accomplishing as much as she would otherwise have been able to do.

On the morning of the day on which our story commences, Mary had expressed a longing for an orange. In her fever it would have been grateful to her.

It is hard indeed when we are obliged to deny to those we love that would be a refreshment and a benefit to them.

Mrs. Jones felt this, and so did Edward. "I only wish that I could buy you one, Mary," said Edward, just as he set out for the store. "Next year I shall receive a larger salary, and then we won't have to pinch so much.

'Never mind, Edward," said Mary, smilng faintly, "I ought not to have asked for it knowing how hard you and mother find it to get along without me.

Don't trouble yourself about that, Mary," said Mrs. Jones, soothingly, though her heart sank within her at the thought of her empty larder. "Only get well, and we shall get along well enough afterward." It was with the memory of this scene that

Edward went to the store in the morning. All around were boxes of rich goods representing thousands of dollars in money. thought he, if I only had the val ue of one of these boxes, how much good it would do poor Mary." And Edward sighed, The long day wore away at last, and Edward was about to close the warehouse. But as he passed the desk of his employer his attention was drawn to a bit of paper lying on the floor beneath. He picked it up, and to his great joy found it to be a ten dollar bill.

The first thought that flashed upon him was, "How much good this will do Mary; I can buy her that orange she wants, and she shall have some every day, and perhaps she would like a chicken.'

But a moment later his countenance fell.
"It isn't mine," he sighed. "It must be Mr. Hubbard's. This is his desk, and he must have dropped it."

'Still," urged the tempter, "he will 'never know it. And after all what are ten dolars to him? He is worth a hundred thous-

Still, Edward was not satisfied. Whether Mr. Hubbard could spare it or not, was not the question. It was rightfully his, and must be given back to him.

"I'll go to his house and give it to him this very night," said Edward. "Other-wise I will be tempted to keep it." He determined to go to Mr. Hubbard's before he went home. The sight of his sister would perhaps weaken his resolution, and this must never be. He must preserve his integrity at all hazards. He knew where Mr. Hubbard lived. It was a large, fine looking house, on a fashionable street. He had passed it several times, and wondered whether a man must not feel happy who is able to live in such style. Without unnecessary delay, therefore, he went to the house, and ascending the steps, rang the bell. A servant came to the door.

"Well?" he said.
"Is Mr. Hubbard at home?"

'Yes, but he has just come in, and I don't TREASURER'S SALE | 3614 think he can see you," was the supercilious

"I am in his employ," said Edwird, quietly, "and I have just come from the store. I think he will see me if you mention this

"Very well, you can come in."
Edward was left standing in the hall, while Mr. Hubbard was sought by the "Well!" he said inquiringly, "has anything happened?"

"No, sir," said Edward, "but I picked up this bill near your desk, and I suppose you must have dropped it. I thought I had better bring it here directly."
"You have done well," said Mr. Hubbard, "and I will remember it. Honesty is a very valuable quality in a boy just com-mencing a business career. Hereafter I shall have perfect confidence in your hon-

Edward was gratified by his assurance, yet as the door closed behind him, and he walked out into the street, the thought of his sister sick at home again turned upon 410 him and he thought regretfully how much | 160 good could have been done with ten dollars. So Not that he regretted that he had been honest. There was satisfaction in doing right, but I think my readers will understand his feelings without explanation.

Mrs. Jones brought some toast to her daughter's bed-side, but Mary motioned it 433 153 away. "I thank you for taking the trouble to make it, mother, but I don't think I could possibly eat it, ' she said. "Is there any thing you could relish,

Mary?"
"No," she said, hesitatingly, "nothing Mrs. Jones sighed-a sigh which Edward echoed. It was with a heavy heart that Edward started to the warehouse the next morning. He had never felt the cravings for wealth that now took possession of him.

He set about his duties as usual. About two hours after he had arrived at the warehouse Mr. Hubbard entered. He did not at first appear to notice Edward, but in about half an hour summoned him to the office, which was partitioned off from the remainder of the spacious rooms in which goods were stored.

He smiled pleasantly as Edward entered 5618 61 4287 79 4287 330 his presence. Tell me frankly, did you not feel an impulse to keep the bill which you found last "I hope you won't be offended with me,

Mr. Hubbard," said Edward, "if I say I "Tell me all about it," said Mr. Hub5904 1000 bard, with interest. "What was it that withheld you? I should never have known 5918 anything about it."

"I knew that," said Edward. "Then what withheld you from tak- 5619

"First I will tell you what tempted me," said Edward. "My mother and sister are | 5913 106 obliged to depend upon sewing for a living, and we live but poorly at best. But a fort- 5921 1100 night since Mary became sick and since that | 4287 we have had a hard time. Mary's appetite 5619 is poor, and she does not relish food, but we 5906 are not able to get anything better. When picked up that bill I could not help thinking how much I could buy with it for her.'

"And yet you did not take it?" "No, sir, it would have been wrong, and I could not have looked you in the face af-

Edward spoke in tones of modest con-Mr. Hubbard went to his desk and wrote a check. "How much do I pay you now?" he "Fifty dollars a year,,' said Edward. "Henceforth your duties shall be increased, and I will pay you two hundred. Will 132 that please you? "Two hundred dollars a year !" exclaimed | 427 Edward, his eyes sparkling with delight. "Yes, and at the end of the year that will be increased, if, as I have no doubt you will, you continue to merit my confidence.

"Oh, sir, how can I thank you? said Edward. "By preserving your integrity. As I presame you are in present need of money, I 404 will pay you one quarter in advance. Here | 404 is a check for fifty dollars which you can get cashed at the bank. And, by the way, you can have the rest of the day to yourself."

Edward flew to the bank, and with his sudden riches hastened to the market, where No. he purchased a supply of provisions such as | 2004 400 he knew would be welcome at home, and 3579 1020 then made haste to announce his good 3573

A weight seemed to fall off the hearts of the mother and daughter as they heard his | 5926 296 hurried story, and Mrs. Jones thanked God | for bestowing upon her son those good principles which had brought this great relief. And Mr Hubbard slept none the worse that night that at a slight pecuniary sacrifice he had done a kind action, confirmed a boy in his integrity and, gladdened a strugling family. If there were more employers | 324 as considerate as he, there would be fewer dishonest clerks. SELF EDUCATION.—Horace Greely gives the poor boy the following excellent maxims, as rounds of the ladder to honorable position and wealth: 1. Stock your mind with practical and useful knowledge of things around you, especially such as may essentially aid you in your adopted calling.

2. Acquire as early as practicable such a calling, but none other than a useful and honorable one. 3. Resolve not to be a rover; where you have stuck your stake, always stand by it.

4. Comprehend that there is work almost anywhere for him that can and will do it. Favorite game of blacksmiths-old sledge. 3603 150
