for the farmer.

Evergreens Among Orchard Trees. Heretofore, planting evergreens among orchards of fruit, has been deemed incongruous, and undeserving the attention of planters, or as presenting a careless waste of land without system or order in arrangement. From some observation we have made this From some observation we have minde this season, however, and from records of sev-eral of our correspondents, we predict that $au_{2,2,1883-1y}$ between a some observation of the seven of the seven and the seven but a few years will find many orchards interspersed irregularly with evergreen trees. Closer planting than heretofore recommended, we have no doubt will prevail, as our fruit growers study the devastating effects fruit growers study the dovision to bery, Grape Vines, Gosseberry, Lawton Biack of too much exposure of the young trees to wind and sun. In most sections this year, Sibrian Crabtrees Quince and early Scarlet Rhea. while fruit bloomed and set abundantly, barb Ac gradually, little by fittle, it has dropped, until many a grower who in early summer counted on bushels can now count fruit only by the dozen. We have watched this failing of the fruit pretty carefully, and while we have no doubt that too great amount of and re-f blood impaired the vitality and was the first general. Charges moderate cause of failure, yet observation has taught us that trees partially shaded and screened by evergreens, or by close planting with N other trees, have retained their fruit, as a rule, better than those exposed to the rays of the sun at all points, and the withering blasts of winds, no matter from what quarter. Horticulturists at the west have for some time advocated hedge screens as a protection to their orchards, and we have no desire to undervalue them, while at the same time we would in planting an orchard of five hundred trees, make one fifth the number everyreens. Again ; believing in closer planting, we, a few years since, set out a dwart pear orchard, four by eight feet, and an apple orchard of standards, twelve feet apart. The pears it is true, growing one way pretty close together yet they are all healthy, and this season have retained their fruit better than others which are fina just received and opened at the old stand wider apart.

Management of a Manure Heap.

You justly remark that some mosture is necessary for the proper decomposition of manure, which, no doubt is true, especially if the ingredients are all coarse. Keep all decomposed fermented fertilizers sheltered vant advantage. Nov. (5, 1866 from rain and atmospheric influences; but if composed largely of straw, refuse stulks and the like, put in an open yard, allowing all the water to fall on it which comes direct from the clouds, but see that none comes from the surrounding eaves, that no running water be allowed to pass through the yard, and thus wash out the valuable propercies of the manure. Yards should be made slightly dishing, not necessarily, how ever, towards the centre, and it is also wile to have an outlet in case of an overflow, if it can be beneficial and not wasted.
