

For the Farmer.

Shoulder-sprain in horses. Although I do not believe that in one case in ten the farrier is right when he talks of shoulder-strain, yet it cannot be denied that the muscles of the shoulder do sometimes get strained. This is often off and on, a step or side fall than by violent exertion. It is of considerable importance to be able to distinguish shoulder-strain from other kinds of lameness.

If, on standing before the horse and looking at the size of the two shoulders, or rather their points, one shoulder appears to be larger than the other, we must not think it an indication of a strain of the muscles of the shoulder. It probably arises from a bruise of the shoulder, the heat and tenderness, if there is any, will be found within the arm, close to the chest, and belonging more to the muscles of the breast than of the shoulder.

In cases of shoulder-strain the horse will evidently suffer extreme pain, and he will extend the injured muscle as little as possible. One plain and unmistakable sign of shoulder-strain is, that the animal will drag his toe along the ground, rather than raise it clear.

Another proof is, that when the foot is lifted high, and then brought far forward, the bruise will show signs of increased pain, which would not be the case if the hurt was in the foot or leg.

The best remedy which can be applied is total rest and food of a nature calculated to keep the bowels loose and open. If the food does not accomplish this purpose, a moderate dose of physic may be given. Covered as it is by the bone, the injured parts can not readily be reached by the application of external remedies, and hence little can be done more than to keep the horse quiet.

Care of Stock in Winter.

For several years I have practiced giving sheep, cattle and horses, salt made fine, mixed with sifted hard wood ashes, equal parts; a teaspoonful to a cow or horse once a day, or a larger quantity once or twice a week, and corresponding portions, to smaller animals and sheep. Where old-fashioned chimney soot can be had, the effects is still better; but put equal parts of salt, ashes and soot together. The severe winter weather of these Northern regions operates on both man and beast, and some tonic is usually necessary in the spring to set the system right.

I do not believe a man can do justice to himself, his stock, or his God, who will feed nothing but straw, stalks, or even hay, and let them be exposed to night to the merciless blasts of old Boreas or be pinched in the fingers of "Jack Frost."

Hogs gnawing their troughs may result from a habit contracted at a season when they were not full fed, and it may be from something else. Throw some rotten wood into the pen. Let them gnaw that as they will greedily. It will be good for them, and may be the means of curing them of gnawing sound wood. Hogs also relish charcoal; give them some two or three times a week.

Egyptian Corn is of little value, producing but a single ear of inferior corn.
