THE SIEGE OF RICHMOND—THE POSITION OF GRANT'S ARMY.

The assault of the rebels upon the Union picket line of Fort Mifflin, and the order of Gen. Hancock for the formation of a new army corps, have directed attention, for the moment, from the operations of Sherman, and recalled the people to the consideration of matters around the rebel capital. In order that the situation near Richmond may be properly understood, we present the following diagram of the position of Grant's army as it is at present.

The manuscript was addressed to Mr. Ashburton, and I frankly told my friend that I had no objection to his claiming the credit of the article...

A cheery laugh from Mr. Ashburton, and a bright smile from his wife followed my words. "Mrs. Whitford," said the gentleman, "I am glad to see that you are so generous of heart..."

"I understand you, Clara," I answered, "and I can explain it in a very few words. Mrs. Ashburton says that she has no objection to the credit of the article being given to her..."

"Well," said I, one fine morning last week, "I have the prospect of a leisure afternoon—a something that I have long desired, and all being well, I will devote it to a useful and pleasant occupation..."

"On arriving at Clara's door, I was not a little surprised to see no light in the front parlor. I thought I would call on her, and I had just left..."

"I was beginning to tire of waiting—my brick walk over I felt chilly in the fresh morning breeze. I sat down on the bench, and I was waiting for her..."
