THE BLIND BOY. To the Editors of the Franklin Repository: In your paper of the 11th of October you published a piece of poetry on a "Child Awake," and in a later number "On a Sleeping Infant."

It was a blessed Summer day, The flowers bloomed—the air was mild, The little birds in nature's choir, And everything in nature smiled.

"What a glorious night!" she remarked. "I never saw the moon shine with greater splendor." "May it prove a happy omen to us, fair Ellen," replied Peyton, and, as he spoke, he turned to a white rose which had just opened in the bed room of the pillars, the portico, and called several of its half-blown flowers.

While he was thus employed, Ellen was gazing abstractedly on the fantastic shadows made by the trees, and the moonlight on the grass, and the railing for support, and looked with eyes fascinated with terror on a white shade which seemed to rise from an open space on which the moon's radiance was so brightly reflected.
