You should have their perfect conficase, there will never be any difficulty option of the administrator. in the management of colts or horses, and the owner will always have a trusty and faithful servant. Frights of this kind they will never get over, and half the time this is what brings on the dangerous habit of shying, is makes them suspicious, and they are always looking out for something to take fright at. A common rope halter with a they pull on it a little it tightens around the nose, and hurts them which natural - situate in Roaringereek twp., county aforely makes them want to get away from it and the more it hurts the harder they let on the south, John Yeager on the west, will try to free themselves. In addition and Franklin Yocurs, Michael Fetteroff to contracting a bad habit, they often injure themselves. If such a halter is used more or less with the appurtenances, on that it will be impestible for it to draw tight around the nose; a leather one is Orchard and other fruit. much the best. After the colt is weaned and becomes easily controlled by the haler, it may be tied to the manger in the stable, and given some oats to make it contented. It should be tied at first in the stable whereit has been kept and the person having it in charge should remain two thirds to be paid at the striking down where he can watch is unobserved, to pre- of the property, one fourth of the said two vent any accident. If it makes no re-istance, it should be turned loose in two hours for fear of wearying it and making it restless. This should be repeated every day, increasing the length of the lesson until the colt is perfectly broken to stand tied in the stable or out of doors. By all means avoid keeping colts and young orses, constantly tied up in the stable day after for when treated it this way they contract habits which they never get over, the worst of which is the rack tes, or wind-sucking. They bring on want of something better to do. If they ennot be allowed to jun out, they should on turned loose in a large stall. From the first to the second year they do not need especial attention, further than you and to guard against accidents. They should always be in charge of a careful person, who has good control of his temper and who has a natural fondnes for rees. The time for breaking should depend upon what use the colt is intended for. If for the farm, or road purposes I approve of letting them run until they get their growth, and are well developed -say not before they are three years old and they will last the longer and be less liable to be injured if they run until they are four. It would be just as well ato break them at three if they were used adderately, and at light work, until they are four or five; but people are too apt hem too far, or too fast, and over-tax heir strength. If a colt shows a little speed, there is more danger still, without soft track, hever on the road. They should be used very moderately, with a tiew to speed which should be developed by very slow degrees. By using them in this way they will bear more feed, which will give them an increased amount of bone and muscle, and of a better quality than if they were permitted to run longer, and kept lighter. Over feeding is just as much to be guarded against as over-looking. This method of developing a trotter is slew and tedious, and requires the greatest amount of patience and care. Those engaged in raising therough breaks for the turf begin to break them at eightiem months old, and run them when two years old, but that would not answer for any other pur.
