PRUNING BRUIT TRIBES.

We find some excellent suggestions on the et of pruning fruit trees, by J. T. Elliot Grand Rapids, Mich. They accord exactly with what we have said over and over again for many years in these columns. His unication is dated May, and he begins thus : "The season for trimming fruit trees is approaching," and then goes on as fol-

"We all remember the apple and pear trees, where we had to be "boosted" to reach the lowest branches; and coming out here we have imitated our fathers' follies and fared wome than they. They pruned in February and March, and we have known no better Letting go all discussion of what their interests may be-and looking at home-all experience I hope will not be lost on us and that experience, all points one way. Prune while the wood is growing if you wish the sears to heal quick and sound. Say in June.

"Limbs that grow close together, and paralel, and that cross, must have one of them removed. The formation of crotches must be avoided, or else we lose more or less of trees by spliting down when they get to bearing. If practical, establish a leading branch, and grow laterals at intervals. Some will need little, and other sorts much cutting,"

Mr. Elliott also advises to grow heads low, with the lower branches not over two feet. if possible, from the ground. They stand the high winds better, are handsomer, and the fruit is more easily got at. If the plow cannot approach the tree in consequence of this system of growing, so much the better, as a plow never ought to get near a fruit tree. All this is sound doctrine. Low-branched trees also protect their trunks against the hot sun of summer, which sometimes is very in. jurious, as well as, to a certain extent, against the freezing and thawing process of winter.

There is a marked difference between the amputated limbs of trees that have been operated on respectively in February and June or July. The first often show, especially where the limbs are of any considerable size a black stump, which never changes, except to decay; while those of the latter readily heal over, and present a neat appearance. Besides, early summer pruning insures fruit buds, while spring pruning gives us only SHELTERING MANURE, -Stable manure kept under shelter, and properly mixed with absorbing substances, muck, leaves, strawy litter, &c., is of much greater value than when exposed in the open yard. An analysis made at the English Agricultural College, shows that it contains more than double the quantity of nitrogenized matter, and the same of salts, containing organic and inorganic soluble in water, while of potash and soda, the unsheltered manure retains only .08 percent. and sheltered 2 per cent. It would pay farmers well to build manure sheds.

The Manure of Fowls is of great value to farmers. A few weeks before planting corn time, mix the manure with ashes and plaster in proportions of about four parts manure. one part ashes, and one part plaster. Let it dry and pulverize. Drop a handful in each hill, and cover slightly with earth before plantine. which carries off more victims than any other discase and which baff s the skill of the Physicians to a greater extent than any other malady, often YIELDS TO THIS REMEDY

Build a hen house for your fowls to roost in; one year's manure on your next crop of corn will pay all of the expense, and will, if properly built, with a yard attached, add very much to the increase of eggsthrough the win-

APPLICATION .- The preferable way of applying lime, according to my experience, is on wheat stubble, as the lime gives the grass power to absorb ammonia from the atmosthere, and retains that, which is disengaged by the decomposition of vegetable matter in the soil. From thirty to sixty bushels per acre, once in six years should be applied. Thirty bushels is about equal to one ton.

Good effects have resulted from its application on wheat and corn. When thus applied, it may be spread before plowing, but better afterwards, and thoroughly harrowed in. It should never be combined with manure, unless the whole is immediately plowed

Indications of want of lime in the soil, may be seen in heavy crops of straw, and light crops of grain; and in root crops, where they seem to run to fingers and seed.

Sons.-Lime is applicable to every clay soil, every peaty soil, sandy or thin soil, When applied to the latter, manure should accompany it. Lime will renew many exhausted soils, if properly applied.

The nice adaptation of manures to the peculiar wants of every crop, is a point in farm Grace's Celebrated Salve economy too universally neglected. There should be more system and research by practical farmers. To double the crops on most Grace's Celebrated Salve farms, about all that is neccessary is for our agriculturists to sell off one half their land and with the proceeds buy manure for the other half. The larger the farm the less a man grows to the acre Farmers should always plow deep; the roots will strike deeper into the soil and thus obtain more nourishment, and will stand the draught much better; the ground can afterwards be tilled much deeper, thus enabling the moisture from dews LIQUORS! in times of draught. To Preserve Eggs—The best method know of to preserve eggs, says a correspondent of an exchange; is to fill the pores of the shell with fresh clean lard, so as to exclude I know of to preserve eggs, says a corresponshell with fresh clean lard, so as to exclude all air. It is my opinion that this simple and easy method is preferable to any now in use. Some put them in limewater, some lay them down in salt, some put them in sawdust. dried appearance; salt has a similar effect -while eggs saturated with lard, as far as my experience goes, open fresh and nice.

LIME AND SO-FORTH.

When lime is prepared for agricultural CHARLES B. BROCKWAY long exposed to rain and dews before being spread, it loses a great portion of its fetilizing power, which consists in its decomposing vegetable matter, and neutralizing acids which abound in some soils, especially those subject to flooding or stagmant water.
