It improves the quality of almost every cultivated crop: upon land which has been recently fixed the hull of grain crops is thin-ner, and the grain heavier and consequently will yield more flour, which is said to be much richer in gluten than that from unlim-

It has always been found to make a much reater improvement upon spring sown crops han on winter wheat, and in England it has been noticed that in a very wet season the sheat on limed land is not so much injured limed land under the same or similar ciring effects are not feel owed by corresponding reaction, but are permanent, infusing strength, vigor and New Life inte all parts of the system, and building up in those constitution. by the superabundant moisture as that upon cently limed are found to be much better tasted and more free from damage from insects than upon virgin soil, though it has not been proved that it materially increases the crop. I have used it in both the caustic and slacked state, but prefer the former, and would apply it in an air-slacked form (that is, slacked under cover) applied about the time of the last hoe-harrowing, strewn on top of the ground as nearly on the row as possible; this I consider to be a prevention of rot, either total or partial, in the crop. But I have found it to produce a similar effeet and doing much toward increasing the crop, if, when fresh, it is mixed with half its bulk of common coarse salt. Say one sack of salt to five or six bushels of lime, and the mixture allowed to remain under shelter for cures and recommendations from some of the most eminent physicians, clergymen, and others, will be two orthree months before it is used. When used in this way at the rate of a handfull to in the glass. every three feet of row. I have found it to increase the crop fully as much as the same amount of super-phosphate of approved brand; but I imagine that it does so at the expense of the soil and future crops. If lime is strewn along the rows of peas in the garden after they are a foot high, it will be found to materially benefit the crop, both in quantity and quality, and that the peas when VENT! Containing a Full Grain to each ounce of dried will boil soft more readily,

Of all our crops flax seems to be the only one to which the application of lime is not attended with beneficial results. When applied to this crop it has been found to diminish the strength of the fibre and do nothing to increase the amount of marketable flax. In Belgium it is a rule not to sow flax upon any land which has not been more than seven years without lime.

Lime seems to have the power of altering the natural produce of land, discouraging the growth of some kinds of seed and encouraging the growth of others which have long laid dormant in the soil. Not long since one of my neighbors used lime in conjunction with barnyard manure with his wheat; he he obtained his grass seed from a field on which not a mullein was to be seen, but when the wheat was taken off, the soil was found to be as well set with mullein as with timothy and clover. Before plowing and for a number of years no mulleins had been known THE THROAT, LUNGS & CHEST to go to seed on the field, and but few to grow, probably not more than usually spring that if lime is applied in excess, it will encourage the growth of the red poppy and the yellow cow wheat (melampyrum pratense) and it may be possible that it has the same or a simalar effect upon dormant mullein seed, or it may be that the application of lime with the barnyard manure had something to do with it.

Lime also hastens the maturity of all our crops, especially those of grain, which are brought forward from ten to twelve days earlier when it is used by your friend. - Ge .mantoson Telegraph.

DRAINING.

The importance of draining is not properly understood nor duly appreciated among us. Although water is indispensable to vegetation, too much of it is quite as hurtful as too little. It is necessary to the germination of the seed-to the decomposition of vegetable matter in the soil-to the transmission of food to the plant, to its circulation there ed I then procured a bottle of your excellent Balsam. and to the maturity of the product.

It is not from the surface that we are to determine whether the land is sufficiently beneatted by it. dry to support a healthy vegetation. but we must examine the under stratum from which the plants draw their nourishment. If this is wet, if it grows marshy plants, if water will collect in a hole sunk fifteen inches below the surface, the land is too wet for cultivated crops, and means should be taken to render it more dry.

Cold sour lands are invariably wet, if not Grace's Celebrated Salve on the surface then in the subsoil. Wet lands are generally rich lands because the presence of the water has prevented the decomposition of the vegetable matter, which when the surplus water is drawn off becomes food for the growing crops.

Let me suppose a case which will be found to exist in many portions of the country. There is a slope of a little hill half a mile in extent terminated by a flat through which a little brook runs. The soil of this slope is from eight to ten inches deep, of a porous quality, and resting upon an impervious subfrom eight to ten inches deep, of a porous soil. Near the top of this slope, all along on a horizontal line or perhaps lower down, 'spouts' or springs burst through the suboil, the waters from which find easy passage through the loose, porous soil of the slope and flat, soon find their way into the brook.

A thermometer plunged down to the subsoil in midsummer will indicate a temperature of net more than a state of the citizes of ture of not more than sixty, whereas most of rature of at least seventy to eighty. How shall we remedy this evil and render this land productive? nply by running a drain across the slope ust above where the land is too wet, and thus conduct the water into the brook through

Some will object to this on the plea that it will cost too much, but to such I can give nothing better than the Scotchman's answer to a similar objection, "that it cost more not to

In fact draining makes wet soil dry and. dry soil wet, as has been proved by myself.
