SOME HINTS ON SPRING WORK .-Have you a stock of roots on hand? Every good farmer ought to have. Now is street. the time to feed them out to the animals on the farm, especially mileh cows and breeding ewes, to enable them to give a good supply of milk for their young.

See that the yeaning ewes are separated from the rest of the flock, giving a little extra food, and all tags and dirt removed from them. At lambing time, keep them comfortably housed, with plenty of good, clean straw to lie on, and do not forget to let them have access to clear, pure water at all times. The ewes may be let out into the yard every afternoon, but the lambs are better to remain in the house till they are at least a week old, strong and healthy. All changes and exposure, especially to the sun or rain, is injurious to them, as also is lying on the cold, damp earth .--The lambs will soon learn to eat, if a little fine chopped hay or oatmeal is placed in a shallow box or trough in their house, while the ewes are out, and if it is desired to bring them forward early for the butcher, this extra feeding will help them great-

Feed the cows well, and do not let them fall off in their milk while waiting for the grass to come. Give the working animals enough of such food as will produce muscle,-not fat-and give them a moderate amount of daily exercise.

Keep the yard well littered with straw and the cattle confined to it. There is nothing gained by letting them wander over the farm, making tracks in the soft ground wherever they go. Stock should never go to grass till the ground becomes settled firmly enough to bear them without showing foot-prints half an inch deep. Pile up the manure in the yard as fast as it is made, mixing into the heap all the scrapings of the house, fowl and sheep yards, hog pens, etc.

Pick over the potatoes, and select the largest and soundest for seed. If they are cut, roll them in plaster of Paris, and sprinkle plaster over them while lying in the cellar. It is said to act in some degree as a preventive of the rot. We know of some farmers who sow a tablespoonful of plaster in each hill, or over each set, at the time of planting, and who ascribe the freedom of their potato erop from disease to the use of plaster. From the known tendency of salt to destroy fungoid life in its early stages, we think sowing it on the potato plant might be the means field, Indiana and Cambria counties. Office of mitgating the rot. We however, only two doors west of Crawford's Hotel throw this out as a suggestion to those who are willing to try the experiment.

Mules vs. Horses .- In traversing a desert, where there is much toil and scanty feed, the mule is preferable. He may be prefered, also, where those who perform the labor have no choice about the kindanimals that they use; will sometimes be preferred when some distemper rages among horses; individuals who are unable to be at the expense of keeping horses may now and then prefer them, as a man prefers a blind horse to one that has eyes, because his purse will permit him to obtain the former but not the latter; and sometimes a queer genius will harness a pair of them to his carriage, because they are something odd, and thus produce among some, who are ambitious of notoriety, a rage for mules, till a few of the inexperienced have had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with their virtues: but other cases, in an enlightened and fruitful country; the horse usually receives the preference. There are two reasons for this preferment.

1. His beauty. The horse is one of the handsomest objects that adorn our earth. He is surpassingly beautiful, graceful, and majestic, both in his form and in his movements; while the ugliness of the mule is almost painful to the view. So long as man is an admirer of smiling flowers, graceful trees, fine carriages, and beautiful architecture, and will make sacrifices to secure them, so long he must give the horse the preference, even if there was a deficiency in every other excellence.

2. His docility. The horse has great endurence; though in this he is not equal to the mule. But he is his equal in fleetness, his superior in spirit and courage, and greatly exceeds him in docility. The latter is far more prone to kick, is much more inclined to stubborn wilfulness, and in every way is less tractable and trusty; and as long as man prefers machinery, that will operate without giving him trouble, so long he will prefer the former animal to the latter. The latter may be much less liable to disease, and attain to a much greater age, notwithstanding .-Man prefers to have his possessions in DRY GOODS, quietness and safety for a shorter period rather than to enjoy them longer in turmoil and insecurity. It will therefore pay better to raise horses instead of mules, both for farm purposes and for
