

General Sheridan at the Battle of Winchester.

From "Personal Recollections of Maj. Gen. Sheridan," by an officer of his staff, we quote the following story of the battle of Winchester: At this juncture, Sheridan appeared on the field, having ridden up in hot haste from Winchester. A fearful responsibility suddenly devolved upon him; for, with him alone, rested the safety of thousands of precious lives, the fate of his army and the security of the Federal Capitol—and he was equal to the emergency. Making his way to Gen. Wright's headquarters, he eagerly inquired after the situation, and received the despairing answer: "General, I fear the battle is going against us."

For two hours there was a lull in the conflict, while the stragglers from the different corps were returned to their commands. Then Sheridan proceeded to carry into execution the plans he had hastily formed. First, he sent General Custar with his division of Cavalry to the extreme right, with instructions to concentrate his attack upon a limited portion of the enemy's line—to vex, harass, and distress it, until he should succeed in creating a panic, when, upon a given signal, Sheridan with the rest of his army would cause this panic to communicate itself along the entire length of the enemy's lines. This plan, simple in its conception, was successful beyond the expectation of the commanding General himself. At 4 p. m., Custar having turned the enemy's left flank, a charge was ordered along the whole line.

It seemed hardly credible that the men who were so badly worsted in the morning were the same men who made that magnificent charge in the afternoon. The Sixth Corps sprung forward as if impelled from the cannon's mouth, while the other corps vied with it in impetuosity. The enemy opened on the charging party with fifty pieces of artillery, filling the air with flying missiles. With surprising precision shells were thrown into the solid masses of Union infantry, scattering limbs in every direction, and lifting mangled corpses high in the air. The Federal batteries, likewise, were not idle. Along the crests of the hills on either side of the road, and down the pike close upon the heels of the infantry, they followed. Sheridan seeing one posted in an advantageous position, turned to one of his staff, and said, "Ride down to Capt. — and tell him to fire faster, FASTER." The message delivered, the detonations were almost without interval.

Only once did our infantry, falter when subjected to a scattering fire of musketry from the enemy posted behind a stone wall. The survivors pushed on, and, with the bayonet, drove the opposing force from the wall. The enemy no longer made a stand. Their men alike indifferent to the threats and entreaties of officers, sought safety only in flight. A miserable rabble, they plunged into the stream, and crossing, hurried on through Strasburg toward the mountains, with Sheridan's troopers close upon them. Over forty guns, together with a large number of army wagons abandoned on the road and in the town, fell into the hands of the cavalry. Devin's Brigade, having the advance, was occupied until midnight in securing these trophies. An officer of the brigade fearing a recurrence, rode back to Sheridan's headquarters, when the following dialogue ensued:

"General, I have come back to ask for a brigade of infantry, to help hold the artillery already captured, of which I think we have at least twenty-five pieces." "I don't believe it," said Sheridan, not yet realizing the full extent of the victory. "Who are you?" "Captain B—, of the — Dragoons. General, I believe we have over forty pieces."

"Captain B—, of the — Dragoons. General, I believe we have over forty pieces." "Captain, you shall have two brigades of infantry."

When Custar came back, soon after, to report his wonderful success, Sheridan caught him in his arms, embraced him, and then wrestled with him with all the playfulness of a child.
