A Dark Tragedy.

It was in consequence of a letter received from an old schoolmate whose real name, as I proceed, the reader will perceive the necessity of disguising, that I laid aside my books and papers in the midst of term, and made a hurried journev to a distant town.

Henry St. Claire, as I shall venture to call the friend whose urgent summons I had not felt at liberty to disregard, had been among the most cherished of my early associates; and though I had seen but little of him since the days of our boyhood, and our correspondence, like most others, had been irregular, and had long since ended, I had, nevertheless, from time to time, received such intelligence of him as one naturally gains in answer to inquiries made, as occasion ofhad married; that at the death of his it.
