

love of distinction rests in every one, and if our doings were published it would urge the students to greater effort. Again, an illustrated article in some magazines would be a good advertisement for the college. It would more generally inform people that such a place as State College exists.

It rests with the students to see that we are represented. There are numbers of fellows here who could write interesting articles, which would be gladly received by the newspapers, but for some reason or other they will not take the task. Is it a case of indifference? Let us hope not, but rather one of forgetfulness. We await the day when the sight of the name "State College" in print will be more frequent. And let the articles be headed "State College," not "Bellefonte," as is the case with what little reaches the papers now. Hundreds of people think State College is located in Bellefonte, simply because news items are put out as coming from there. It is time that people should know that State College is located at State College, Pa., and that it has an existence of its own.

Along with and preceding the prosperity and advance that are now clearly in evidence in financial lines for our institution there has been an advance in the prevailing moral tone, which is of equal or greater importance than the financial gain.

As long as it remains true that we make our environments, it must be true that our environments show what we are and the "feel" of the moral atmosphere surrounding us tells others what we are more truly than our words.

The change during the last few months in the moral atmosphere surrounding this college we believe to be most marked and permanent. Things of a questionable character once unnoticed, or joked about, are now being condemned by the students. College pranks are pranks still, as they should be, but wanton destructiveness or worse is being called by its true name. The men are beginning to see clearly that the good name of the college is the only bank account upon which they can draw when they go out into the wider life of the world. The substitution of wrestling matches
