

is the results of hard labor and thoughtful application along definite lines, which have been the means of development resulting in the higher and broader life.

A good institution aims to do work of such character that it is able to select from its own graduates those which have made the best use of their time and have attained the highest development. With proper post-graduate training these persons are able to ideally fill important positions upon the faculty and elsewhere. This is often done. It is the best way to secure competent assistants. Are the loiterers, the rowdies, the shirks and the grumblers the persons who are selected for such positions? If so, it would indeed be a broad jump from "The College Student" to "The College Man." Rather, the one who is recommended,—the one who is selected,—the one who continues his development,—and the one who wins, is he who uses all his opportunities for growth and who makes no unbridged hiatus between the taught and the teacher.
