insist upon such a standard of work upon the part of the student. If university standards of thorough and exact work are insisted upon, as they are, we claim that the student is entitled to a university's freedom in the matter of attendance. The man of the prep school stamp previously alluded to would doubtless flunk out under such a regime, but that is a class of men which the college can well afford to be rid of. The majority of State students came here attracted by superior advantages for training along technical lines, and a large percentage of them are manifesting in a most unmistakable way the sincerity of their motives in that they are working their way through college, a line of action which a man is not likely to undertake with the object of killing time. The larger body of students here have just as high ideals, do work which is in every way as conscientious and painstaking, and are working toward goals fully as definite as any university student. They are in every way as competent as any university man to shoulder the responsibility of regulating their own class attendance, and the only effect in any wise undesirable, of adopting such rules of attendance, would be to eliminate by reason of poor grades, some few irresponsibles and weaklings whom the college can well do without.
