LINCOLN.

Fred Lewis Pattee

When falls a Man, his work heaped round him high,

His tools as last he dropped them from his hand,

His block half hewn, the triumph that he planned

A dream that he alone could glorify,
From out our souls there leaps the sudden cry,
Of half self pity born, as weak we stand

Above the dead so pitiful yet grand :
"This is not death ; his work shall never die."

Shall never die ! Ah lightly words are spent,
And lofty soars the tribute o'er the bier,
And full and tear compelling rings the name

We carve upon the new-hewn monument ;
But will our sons behold it with a tear ?

And thus upon that distant April day,
When in a breath the blameless one was low,

When hushed and awed alike were friend
and foe,

And for an hour the conflict died away,
There sudden rose above the piteous clay

A thousand voices crying in their woe :
"He was divine, till now we did not know ;
He is not dead ; his work shall not decay "

And was it true, that cry above the bier ?
Ah true indeed. The sons now guide the plow ;

To us the war is but the evening tale
Of things afar ; but still we drop the tear
At his great name, and crown his lofty brow.

The Man is real ; the rest grows vague and pale.
