

HIKERS' DETAINED ON WAY TO PENN RELAYS

Freshmen Forced to Spend Night in Rural Bastille on Account of Suspicious Actions

Housebreakers, robbers and dope fiends were a few of the titles given to two Penn State Frosh before spending a night behind the bars, while "boating" their way to the Penn Relays.

For the robbery of a house to be discovered shortly after two khaki clad youths from the Blue and White school had passed through an eastern town, naturally aroused local suspicions.

With all of this evidence against them, the pair were shipped back to the scene of the robbery. Following this same trend of bad luck, it was past the quitting time for the judge who had gone home, when the accused arrived.

Either after their hard head, the next morning the two Frosh went sleepy-eyed before the dispenser of justice, who luckily had a sense of humor.

After having a hearty laugh at their expense, the acquitted men were warned the pair to keep away from all mischief. The two first year men then went on their way, rejoicing and "bumbling" rides, reaching Philadelphia in time for the races.

When the pair were captured, the articles which they possessed were the cause of their detention. Collecting souvenirs on their way, they had gathered some strange things, including silverware from a normal school where they had stopped, and a doctor's and another small metal sign.
