Players Are Too Lax In Observing The Rules—Some Comments On Regulations

It is safe to say that not one golfer in a hundred knows or observes the rules or etiquette of the game where at least ninety-nine of the hundred should.

As stated above many of the laws of the game seem confusing and complex. For this reason some interpretations of the rules are here given for those who are new to the game and for others who have been playing for some time but who have failed to observe them.

The right to start for the first hole, of course, is given in the order which the players have arrived at the teeing ground.

On the teeing ground will be found two discs, making a line at right angles to the line of play. In the space within two club lengths behind these discs the player may tee up his ball in any manner which will be most advantageous to him.

A party should not start to play until those ahead of them are all out of range, no matter how many strokes they have played. It is customary to let those ahead always play their second shots before starting, even if their drives are far beyond the possibility of the player who is about to drive.

If a player drives out of bounds from the tee, he may tee another ball at once and play again, counting this as his second stroke.

On the Fair Green When the player has gone from the tee and the ball has fallen on the fair greens there are other rules which come into effect. The ball in all cases must be fairly struck with the head of the club and not pushed, scraped nor spooned.

One should always make sure that the ball he is about to play is his own. If he is not sure, he must always gain his opponents consent to pick it up for him.

examination. In replacing it, he should be careful to put it where it lay before. Playing an opponent's ball in match play loses the hole unless the opponent has also played the wrong ball.

If the opponent's ball interferes with the play, and it is within a club's length of the ball being played, he may be required to lift it. Of course, in replacing it, he should be careful to put it in the same position. Loose objects such as twigs, stones, or leaves, or anything that is not "fixed or growing" may be removed if they are within a club's length of the ball.

A player may ask the direction of play from anyone, but no one is permitted to stand between him and the hole as a guide. He may not ask advice on what club to use or how to play the ball from anyone but his caddy or partner or his caddy. A person must also be careful that he does not move his ball accidentally or that his caddy does so.

On the Putting Green All ground within twenty yards of the hole is defined as a part of the putting green. There are special rules covering the part of the game played here.

When approaching the putting green, it is the best plan to remove the flag-staff. If it should not be removed the ball lodges against it, the staff must be pulled out to see if the ball will fall in.

If the opponent's ball is within six inches of the hole it may be removed upon request. At all times, a short putt must not be taken for granted, but must be played.

It is part of the etiquette on the putting green that a person shall not stand near a person when he is making a stroke, or move or talk. When everyone has holed out, the party should move from the green at once and see that the flag is replaced in the hole.

PENN STATE TAKES PRIZE IN R. O. T. C. CONTEST

The results of the Fire Arm competition that was ordered to be given at all R. O. T. C. units in the Third Corps Area, have been computed by the War Department and the averages and ranks secured by the different units sent to the military posts.

The shooting at Penn State was under the supervision of Major Johnson who subjected the members of his picked team through a short period of training. The results were very satisfactory when the amount of training given the men is considered and in the competition next year, it is hoped to seize a few first places. Three ranks and averages were computed; one in consideration of the mass competition when the grade obtained by each member of the squad was reckoned; one in consideration of the grade made by each member of the team, being ten picked men from the squad, and one in consideration of the general rank computed from the two other averages in the mass competition.

orders were not received sooner. In the team competition Georgetown had an average of 93.7 and Penn State followed with an average of 91.7. The general average for Georgetown was 75.46 while that for Penn State was 69.52.
