Men who "know it all" are not invited to read this page

Among the men enrolled in the Alexander Hamilton Institute there are more than 32,000 presidents and business heads

The officers of the Company liked him. More than once he was discussed at the board meetings.

"There's exactly the type of man for Production Manager," it was said. "He's clear-headed, well-liked and of executive timber. Let's see what he knows and put it up to him."

But the young man never did become Production Manager, his career is one of those countless tragedies of industry. The officers who wanted to promote him found that they could not promote him.

He knew enough to manage a technical department, but for larger responsibilities he lacked knowledge and self-confidence and decision. He had never grown beyond his departmental management.

He was through at thirty.

AND THE OTHER MAN WHO KEPT ON GROWING

Contrast that man with another of the same age—a man who worked as a chemist for an Ohio industry. The office of General Manager became vacant, and the Company looked around for a man.

Chemical experience was a requisite; but the man must have more. He must know something of factory organization and control, of costs and accounting; of office management, of advertising, merchandising and corporation finance.

To their surprise they found that the young chemist knew all these things. His practical experience had given him technical proficiency, the Alexander Hamilton Institute had given him a grasp of the fundamentals which are found in every industry.

And now he is a stockholder in the Company, sharing its profits in addition to a salary four times greater than his former earnings.

"My business policy was shaped by your Course," he wrote to the Institute; and he added, "In the organization of our Company I owe my present stock holdings to the teachings I received in your Course."

By special arrangement, Mr. Harrison R. Hathaway, assistant registrar of the Alexander Hamilton Institute, will be at the State College Hotel, Monday to Friday of this week, to talk with any men who are interested in learning more about Plant Management, Corporation Finance, Salesmanship and Public Speaking, Commercial Law, Marketing, Banking, Accounting and kindred subjects.

Mr. Hathaway will also be pleased to meet and talk with large or small groups of men at the Fraternity Houses in the evenings, by appointment.
