BOXING—A MAJOR SPORT

Eleven years have passed since the boxing "experiment" was first tried in the laboratory of intercollegiate sport. They have been years of continual unsteady growth and development.

There can be no doubt of its popularity either among students or the general public. The throngs which pack Recreation Hall for each meet, the number of attendants from outside the student body at the intercollegiate, are incontrovertible proof of this popularity.

That boxing has become well-established in the realm of sport needs no substantiation. Its adoption, not experimentally but as a thing of proved value, in four institutions within close proximity to Penn State in the past two seasons is sufficient witness.

There is, furthermore, an opinion of long standing within the Penn State student body that boxing should be made a major sport. It is not the theory of the few but the opinion of the many.

The perennial strength of the Penn State team has tended greatly to place the sport in the high esteem it now holds. The team has been more consistently strong than any of the major sport teams in recent years.

In history, the term "boxing" has connoted undisguised brutality and an unsavory reputation for honesty. It is no longer the bad-boy of athletics.

Finally, no sport, with the exception of football, can compare in any degree with the color of the ring game. In it, speed and conflict are so combined as to raise it above the comparative drabness of other sports to a plane of its own.

Tonight another boxing season will close. For a year the intercollegiate and the coming boxing season will be a topic of conversation.

Student Union, formed to co-ordinate Penn State's many varied activities did a good job on the mass meeting which it sponsored Thursday night.

It will be through gatherings such as these that Penn State will preserve its democratic atmosphere, sometimes considerably clouded in these days of a rapidly growing student body.

DEBATING FOR ALL

At first thought there seems to be little relation between the debating and intramural sports systems at Penn State. Yet a comparison of the two systems reveals that the cardinal principle of intramural sports—athletes for all—may be reworded into the forensic slogan—debating for all.

The majority of institutions which Penn State meets in debating choose their teams much like a varsity sports team is chosen. Candidates try-out for the two places open and the two best men become the varsity debating team, representing the college in every debate.
