Nittany 'Lion Suits' Find Counterpart In Famous Princeton Senior Costumes

Although Penn State's seniors will don their lion suits, emblems of campus royalty, for the first time in tomorrow's Move Up Day ceremonies.

How the suits got their pre-prohibition title at Princeton is an odd but enjoyable tale. It all started when seniors of bygone years were accustomed to gather during the last months of their college careers to recall fittingly joyous events of the four or more years almost passed. Invariably, their reminiscing led them to but one place—a peaceful haven where their throats would not become parched during the progress of the session.

This originated the custom of the "beer suits," overalls of white canvas, which, if not more resistant to "suds wars," were at least inexpensive. And thus do Princeton seniors to this day wear the overalls in the spring although their collegiate ancestors would turn over in their collective graves at seeing the "beer suits" of their undergraduate days worn while lolling over a "coke with cherry."
