that they later gorge themselves. The same applies to the cultural meals served here.

Desirable, Rooms st, so few intellectual opportunities outside of the classroom are offered the student that the lack of them makes him unbalanced. Then they are offered in such large doses that they become almost indigestible. Lecture series are necessary vitamins which have been included in the attempt to balance the intellectual diet of the students. But for such an extensive program to be digested successfully, careful planning is an important factor to be considered.

⊷M. P. K.

By glancing over the schedules, it seems that the second semester is crowded with several lectures a week, while the first was almost devoid of any. It is hard for the student, occupied with studies, bluebooks, and other duties, to attend many talks a week. The difficulty in making arrangements convenient to a large group of speakers naturally results in some crowding. But such hodge-podge arrangement is unwarranted and can be avoided to a great extent. If those in charge of the lectures would cooperate with each other, making plans far in advance, an extensive series of talks might be carried on with greater profit to the student. Less concentration and wider distribution is desirable.
