French students at Emory College do things in a different way. They have segregated in a small village all their own, where they speak French exclusively. As long as they can act like Parisians without importing Follies Bergeres, they'll lead a pleasant life, their classmates say.

One freshman at Butler University in Indiana boasts the largest dormitory in the world. He sleeps on the athletic field, and has 6,583,500 cubic feet of bed-room at his disposal. Maybe he sleeps on third base. We don't know.

Something new is in vogue at Northwestern University. Women there who have back-home ho-hums wear yellow ribbons to inform the date-seeking males of the school that they, the wearers, are not particularly interested in local dates.

There are means and extremes, they say, and Marquette fraternity men must suffer. Every man's name, characteristics, and peculiarities are entered in the police records. Who is the Marquette man. He just can't even look suspicious.

Harvard is having a discouraging struggle in their Beer Battle. Four out of every five Harvard men prefer beer on the dining board, and even that majority doesn't seem to be getting anywhere with the University authorities, who fear both moral and financial difficulties.

University of Washington co-eds, through an organization named the "female aid society," are enabled to select and wear any sort of a fraternity pin they like, just for the bother of choosing, and the payment of a rental fee.

Faculty Members Choose Swimming As Favorite Sport

Despite the fact that heretofore there have been no facilities for aquatic sports here, 125 members of the faculty chose swimming as the sport in which they most enjoyed participation, according to a survey conducted by Martin S. McAndrews, graduate student.

Hiking, with 102 adherents, ranks second in popularity, and golf follows close behind with ninety-five. Ninety-four get the most pleasure from tennis, while sixty-one profess to enjoy gardening. Fifty-eight faculty members selected hunting and fishing as their favorite recreation.

Bowling, horseshoes, and social dancing complete the first ten recreations most enjoyed. Some of the more unusual hobbies revealed by the survey include axework, archery, croquet, fencing, and cello playing.

The sports which the faculty members enjoy most as spectators seem to be chosen from the intercollegiate competition here. Football, with 218 adherents, leads the list, followed by boxing with 145, and basketball, with 132. 127 selected baseball, ninety-seven named wrestling, while sixty-four prefer to witness a track meet. Tennis, soccer, and lacrosse follow in order of popularity with faculty members. Other sports which claim devotees among instructors are golf, hockey, and swimming.
