Communism Declining In China, States Koo

or by forcing China into the role of a subservient nation. They have chosen the latter method, and it means suicide for them.

"In the first place, military operations in such a vast country as mine cannot be concentrated in a relatively small area. If the Japanese invaded all of China proper, they would have to put millions of men in the field which they can ill afford; they would have to build an entire system of communication, transportation; and their forces would have to be everywhere at once. For no sooner would they leave a province weakly garrisoned to attack in another section than that province would immediately arise in revolt. The Japanese can never conquer China; the structure of their government would crack in the process. But they will try to undermine the strength of China by industrial competition and by segregating the provinces into spheres of political influence, as they have succeeded in doing in the north."

Regarding the internal political situation in China, Dr. Koo stated his views on the government. The best form of government for China, he said, would be a limited constitutional government which would not interfere in the internal life of the people.

"The Chinese," he explained, "are the least governed people in the world. Business, finance, and education are so organized that they could work on smoothly even if the government would go out of existence. In the matter of franchise, I believe that it should be restricted in my country to the educated class, who, I believe, form the only group in China capable of voting intelligently."

The students comprise the leading class in Chinese society, Dr. Koo said. He pointed out that they have always led in the political life of the country.

"It is said among my people," he declared, "that what a student thinks today, all China will think tomorrow."

Education, he intimated, has broken away from classical tradition. In the past, he explained, education consisted of a detailed knowledge of the classics which form the basis of Chinese thought. The reaction to this time-honored doctrine, he pointed out, is now being expressed in the widespread emphasis on scientific learning, so much so, that cultural courses are being dropped by many of the leading universities in favor of scientific instruction.

Dr. Koo praised the work of Penn State in China highly. "It is the universities set up by organizations such as yours," he said, "that China seeks to emulate. Your work here has led the way for the development of our own institutions of higher learning on the Western plan."
