We, The Women

Houseparty Thoughts In The Dorm At 4 a. m.

WITH THE first night of houseparty over and most coeds either asleep or still bulling about last night's events and who was with whom, here we sit in a quiet lounge at 4 a. m. with a typewriter and copy paper in front of us wishing that the paper would suddenly decide not to go to press so that we could go to bed.

As we run nervous fingers through hair which must be put up, we decide to vote for the candidate who will either do away with Saturday newspapers on houseparty weekends or do away with houseparties.

We think madly of something to write about, something to discuss gripe about, but we always get back to the same subject—we want to go to bed.

Maybe everyone will sleep until noon and won't want to read the women's page. And perhaps those who do won't notice that our column isn't there. And maybe those who do notice will surmise that the type lice ate the copy.

Even a newspaper woman deserves a night of sleep, but here it is 5 a. m. and the sun is coming over the mountains. That's it! We'll write about the joys of staying up to see the sun come up. But all we can think of is the joys of a cozy bed.

We're just too sleepy to go on thinking. We'll blame it on the type lice and climb under the blankets. Good night!

Shakespeare Has The Word For It

Don't say we didn't warn you! If you're out walking some fine houseparty morning with your heart's desire about the time the sun begins to come up, and his (or her) face takes on the yellowish-green appearance of a corpse, don't let it bother you. You won't be the first who has noticed the effect of the false dawn on the color of the human countenance.

Bill Shakespeare took note of that fact about 350 years ago when he had Juliet tell Romeo, in the wee, sma' hours, "Methinks I see thee, . . . as one dead in the bottom of a tomb."

Dr. William S. Dye explains to his Shakespeare classes that Juliet is referring to the way her lover's face looks under the pale light of the false dawn.

So, when it's about five in the morning and you look at your companion and make the startling discovery that, by all appearances, he (or she) has apparently dropped dead, think nothing of it. Just pretend you're Romeo and Juliet!

"The Latin American likes a good show. Hitler has been giving the world just that. Isn't it only natural that South Americans should look on him with favor?"

Thus, Prof. Paul R. Daugherty, head of the Spanish department, former resident of Argentina, and keen student of Hispanic America, commented recently on the South American question-mark which is causing so many Washington headaches.

"Why are we having trouble making allies of South American nations? Because," Daugherty explained, "we've muffed the ball! We don't know their countries and their customs; we've never taken time out to try to understand them. We haven't cooperated with them in the past; we've used the 'big stick'."

"Another thing, you can't walk into a man's office down there and get businesslike right away," the professor declared. "You've got to approach him first in the good old South American way, on a social basis. The high-pressure tactics our salesmen use don't go over down there."

Typical of the South American republics which look askance at U. S. overtures, Daugherty continued, is Argentina, the most powerful nation of the south. He pointed out that our "Colossus of the North" policy of imperialism had inspired something less than trust for the "yawn'kees," as we are known south of the equator. Competition between the two essentially similar economies of United States and Argentina, he added, has helped to aggravate the situation.

"This feeling of political jealousy, probably due to misunderstanding, is what caused the reluctance of Argentina to cooperate with Secretary of State O'Connell Hull at the Havana Conference," explained Daugherty. "It can be overcome only if we realize that we must sell ourselves culturally to Hispanic America before we can sell ourselves economically."

Asked what countries to the south our government must watch most closely, the professor pointed to Brazil, with its large German populace, to Columbia, with its German airlines, to Costa Rica, Panama, and Mexico, all with definite totalitarian tendencies in evidence.

"In Argentina, while I was there, we used to have an occasional student riot or labor disturbance," he declared, "which the North American papers would almost invariably describe as a revolution. I have been reliably informed that the recent trouble in Mexico was distorted in the same fashion in our newspapers."

"I have always had the feeling that we Americans are too provincial," he smiled. "We don't get outside our own country. We've got to learn to know our neighbors better."

Dorm Names Committee

A selected house committee of five freshman women who will supervise the purchase and arrangement of decorations, games, and magazines in Women's Building includes Kathryn R. Brong, Helen E. Dodd, Jane H. Murphy, Marion J. Reynolds, and Alberta M. Spudis.

With Other Women—

Fencing, Cheerleaders, Socks Attract Coeds

University of California coeds are being trained to officiate at fencing tournaments by Helena Mayer, world champion fencer, and Fredrica Bernhard, fencing coach for women. The course is open to all women students who have had one semester or more of fencing or its equivalents.

Three hundred men and three hundred women at the University of Indiana held exchange dinners one evening last week.

Women cheerleaders have been approved by the ASUU executive council for the University of Utah. Two coeds will be considered for such positions.

Knee-length socks and novelty shoes are sweeping the University of Utah campus. Carved heels and open-cut shoes cop top honors for more dressy occasions.

Mortar Board chapter at the University of Illinois held a homecoming breakfast for their alumnae. This is the only chapter of 72 national chapters to have this custom.

CA Will Begin Finance Canvass

The annual drive for contributions to the Penn. State Christian Association will begin Nov. 11 and continue through Nov. 15.

The chairmen of the Finance Canvass have been announced by the association as follows: Edward H. Rohrbeck, Professor of Agriculture extension, faculty chairman; Marjorie A. Harwick '41, president of W. R. A., will canvass women students; William B. Bartholomew '41, president of the senior class, will canvass men students.

As the chief source of revenue for the association, these contributions make possible all of the numerous activities which it engages in throughout the year.

Driving School Class Scheduled For Monday

The next class of the Safe Driver Training School will begin November 4 at 7:00 p. m. at the State College High School, Room 13. It is suggested that those people wishing to take this course, enroll before the first class meeting, at the Centre County Motor Club office in the Hotel State College.

This course is conducted by the approved methods of driver training developed by Prof. Amas Neyhart. Ten lessons in the classroom and twenty lessons in the dual control car are given by trained instructors.

Mankato (Minn.) State Teachers College this year placed 97.6 per cent of its two-year graduates.

Clark Wins Races In Swimming Meet

Copping first place in every event she entered, Louise "Babs" Clark '41, took individual honors in the swimming meet held in White Hall's pool at 8 p. m. Thursday.
