

We, The Women—
Students Belittle
Faculty Relations

Much time is spent on the part of students in planning faculty relations. However, in most instances, plans are the culmination of all efforts.

Faculty relations, undeniably, are an essential part of our college education, and how much we make of them is up to us. It is all very well to invite faculty members to chaperon our dances, attend teas and coffee hours, come to dinner and speak at meetings. But our part as hosts and hostesses does not end there.

We have invited them; they are our guests. And it is our responsibility to show them every courtesy we would in our own homes. Many times we forget they have sacrificed an afternoon or an evening of their scarce time to accept our invitations.

Likewise, we forget that every year they meet new students, thousands of them. The task of remembering these newcomers is a tremendous one, and one the faculty does not have to undertake.

On the other hand, Penn State students have often been complimented on their hospitality toward visitors to the campus. Many letters of praise as well as spoken recognition of this spirit have reached authorities.

This is a tribute to our students and one we can afford to be proud of. It has been said that every student makes a special effort to make visitors feel at home.

Why can't this same attitude be prevalent toward our own faculty members? In some case, no doubt, it is, but in the majority are those instances when the faculty feels this business of getting better acquainted with students is hopeless.
