

Colleges Told Deferment Is Their Job

WASHINGTON, March 27—(IWP)—The American Council on Education told college and university presidents throughout the country today that it is their definite responsibility to request occupational deferment for students who are "potentially necessary men in preparation for an occupation essential to the national health, safety, or interest," even though students do not themselves ask for deferment from selective service.

Last week's "policy letter" from national draft headquarters, the Council said, carries "definite implications" for college and university officials.

"For the college to request the occupational deferment of every student, even in fields such as medicine and chemistry, would violate the fundamental legal provision of prohibiting group deferments. If the colleges and universities are to be of genuine assistance to local boards, they must be willing to refuse to make such requests for students who are not potentially necessary men," the Council warned.

The educational association urged colleges to acquaint students with the letter sent last week to all local draft boards calling for the occupational deferment of students "in training or preparation" for occupations important to national health and safety. College administrators should "take the initiative," the Council declared, in asking deferment for potentially necessary students who fail to request occupational deferment.

"The fact that no fields essential to the national health, safety, or interest are named provides a broader interpretation than if a few fields had been listed," the letter to presidents continued. "There are undoubtedly some students in every field who possess such qualities that they are potentially 'necessary men.' This very fact makes even more essential a careful appraisal of each individual student subject to selective service."

The Draft Local Boards Often Disagree

By JOHN A. BAER

One cause of uneasiness among students who expect to receive new draft classifications in June is the wide variance in decisions of local draft boards.

This variance can be shown very readily by the following example. Two roommates, juniors in the same eastern medical college, were classified by different draft boards. Although they were practically of equal ability, one was given II-A status (occupational deferment) and permitted to continue his education.

The other was classified as I-D (blanket student deferment) which forces him to report for service at the end of the current scholastic year.

Although the inconsistency of classifications is a grave problem, it is a natural consequence of the way in which local draft boards work. They have full authority. They are not bound by strict rules from Washington but merely by general suggestions which often do not apply to individual cases.

An attempt is being made to correct this but there are approximately 6,500 local boards and any change in the draft machinery takes time. However, definite policies are being set up as fast as possible.

The American Council on Education through the Subcommittee on Military Affairs is helping in this work by taking a national survey of decisions affecting college students. Incomplete results show that it may be wise for Selective Service officials to take one of two courses:

1. The first alternative would be for officials to issue definite regulations governing deferment of men in essential occupations or students who are preparing for those occupations. This would be the more simple method for it would require no changes in the Selective Service Act, only a different interpretation of the existing law.

2. The second course would be for Congress to enact new legislation requiring deferment of "essentially employed" persons. This, Congress is reluctant to do because it would probably start a hundred unnecessary deferment bills rolling up Capitol Hill.

In either case, there should be a satisfactory solution of the problem of student deferments.

7 IF Teams Enter Sing Tomorrow

Competing for the Interfraternity sing trophy Sunday afternoon after the symphony concert in Schwab Auditorium will be seven fraternity groups of 16 vocalists each, and there have also been four fraternities entered to sing "The Hills of Old Penn State" in a separate contest being sponsored by Fred Waring.

Fred Waring is offering a separate trophy to the fraternity judged best in singing "The Hills of Old Penn State." The winning group will sing this song also at IF Ball. Those fraternities entered are: Beta Theta Pi, Phi Delta Theta, Phi Sigma Kappa, and Tau Kappa Epsilon.

Fraternities or other organizations wishing to purchase 30 or more tickets may reserve a block of seats anywhere in the auditorium.

College men will probably be able to closely predict how they will be classified and to prepare for their future under the Selective Service Act.
