We, The Women

Memories of sour harmonies as the press began to roll, of linotypers that humored us through our blunders, of the press collapsing at the deadline and the speedy change to another machine.

It would not be complete without the memory of the first days of the daily—how we sweated to switch from the leisurely twice-weekly publication to the all-out daily.

Greatest wonder of all is how, as we acquired the journalistic slang, we managed to write a reasonable facsimile of English.

But this "swan song" will never be completed—there's too much that we don't want to write an ending to—too much we wanted to do that we never accomplished.

But it's too late now—our last deadline must be made. Then we can go home with those dirt-smudged faces and elbows, victorious but sad with our last issue of the "rag" tucked safely 'neath our arms.
