A Penn State Press

At a recent meeting of a freshman honorary, a member of the history department and one of the organizers of the national fraternity spoke to the students who were about to be initiated into the society. He spoke about their having distinguished themselves by showing that they had it within them to do good work and hoped that they would keep on doing this kind of work throughout their college careers and later on when they would enter their chosen fields.

But the point he brought up that was of most significance was his hope that some day Penn State would have a press like the University of Chicago Press or the Columbia University Press or any of the other colleges that publish books that are written by the members of their faculties and graduate students.

Perhaps it has never been thought of by the trustees or other members of the College's executive board, or perhaps the expense that would be involved would be too great, but the fact is that a press such as this would be an outlet for the research work that is done on this campus and the fine books that are written by the faculty members. It would be a manner of expressing the commendable work that is done on this campus by its scholars. It would help establish Penn State in the minds of educators throughout the country as a College that has an outstanding staff.

During wartime, however, it would probably be impractical for the Commonwealth to allot money for this cause. But after the war, when things are straightened out again, we hope that we will be able to boast of the Pennsylvania State College Press.

The Kids Work Overtime

Last night for the second time within two weeks, a group of youngsters, their average age 17 years, presented a concert of heavy symphonic music to an audience made up of regular students, Summer session students, and townspeople. This group of youngsters has come to Penn State for a six-week session to pick up a little extra musical knowledge besides that which they are getting in their high school training.

They are taking time out, however, to give to students here some benefit from that training they are picking up. They are giving them symphonic music which they could not hear while they are going to college. They are helping to ease the strain of a semester in which it is extremely hard for most of us to "stay on the ball."

Their contribution is one which is appreciated by all the people who have taken advantage of the chance to hear really good music here far from any metropolitan music center.

They wouldn't have to do this. They could quit each evening and each Friday. They could let the rest of the people around here completely alone. They don't though. Hat's off to them. They're doing a real job.

Through The Needle's Eye

We wander into The Daily Collegian office occasionally, and every time we do we're greeted with a burst of song. This stems from a couple of kids on the junior board of this paper. When they're not busy trying to convince their respective editors that they are sharp apples, they answer to the names of Jane Murphy and Dick Smyser.

Confronted with a morale problem among the freshmen, Tribunal members screeching that the frosh weren't having their hatches battened solidly enough, Murph and Smys retreated into a closet and went to bat for the frosh. The tune is missing, but the sentiment is sweet and appropriately tuned to the times.

Plea For Prestige

Can't we be more than just frosh?
Can't we be the class of '40-sumpin'?
We wouldn't mind the hazin'
Tribunal's boys are raisin'
If—gosh!—We were more than just frosh!

Some call us "Class of '46."
But, that ain't the year we're graduatin'
And since we're designated
To be accelerated,
Upperclassmen!—Why aren't we more than freshmen?

We've heard the jumpin' jive
Of the Class of '45,
And the roar of '44.
We've been to the jamboree
Of the Class of '43.
But, how can we sing our song
When we don't know where we belong?

We wore our ribbons and our dinks
Just like the others gone before us.
They all had their number
So, classmates, let's not slumber,
Till—gosh!—We're more than just frosh!

We like these kids' songs, and we're more than glad to turn our column over to this specimen. But, more important to us, is the idea of Charlie Ridenour and his Tribunal team commissioning Smys and Murph to write a class song for the "unplaceables" before the Fall football games.

3 School Groups To Give Concert

Third in a series of concerts sponsored by the band, orchestra and chorus school will be presented in front of the Library at 6:30 p. m. Sunday. The symphonic band will present the program.

The first two programs presented by the band were attended by large groups of students and townspeople. The first, presented Sunday, July 13, had approximately 500 in its audience. The second, presented in Schwab Auditorium last night, was attended by about 1,190 persons. In case of rain the concert will be postponed.

All-College Fiesta

School, International Business Machine corporation, Commercial Art Museum of Philadelphia, and Pan-American Union.

Refreshment booths will be run by the Home Economics Club, Miss Haidt stated, and a display of Latin fruits and foods will be featured there.

"Informality is to be emphasized," Miss Haidt said last night, "and guests are urged to be part of the crowd instead of drifting to the side and spending the evening watching."
